BEADLE'S

No. 17.

The Choicest Works of the Most Popular Authors.

MADGE WYLDE;

OR,

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF ORPHAN LIFE.

Mew-Mork and London: BEADLE AND COMPANY, 141 WILLIAM ST., N. Y.

Ross & Tousey, General Agents.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by Bradle and Company, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New-York.

SEQUEL TO "BILL BIDDON."

TO ISSUE FRIDAY, MARCH 1ST,

NAT TODD;

OR, THE

FATE OF THE SIOUX CAPTIVE.

BY EDWARD S. ELLIS.

Author of "SETH JONES," "THE FRONTIER ANGEL," "BILL BIDDON," &c., &c.

This romance of adventure in the far Northwes recalls upon the stage the inimitable NAT Todd, whom the reader of "Bill Biddon" will remember with pleasure. Nat pursues his peculiar way, in pursuit of an apparent ignus fatuis, striking out on the Oregon Trail to the forts of the Northwest, and from thence penetrating to that wonderful region where the feet of very few white men have trodden. He encounters such dangers, undergoes such suffering and tribulation, sees such sights as make his story one of most striking and peculiar interest.

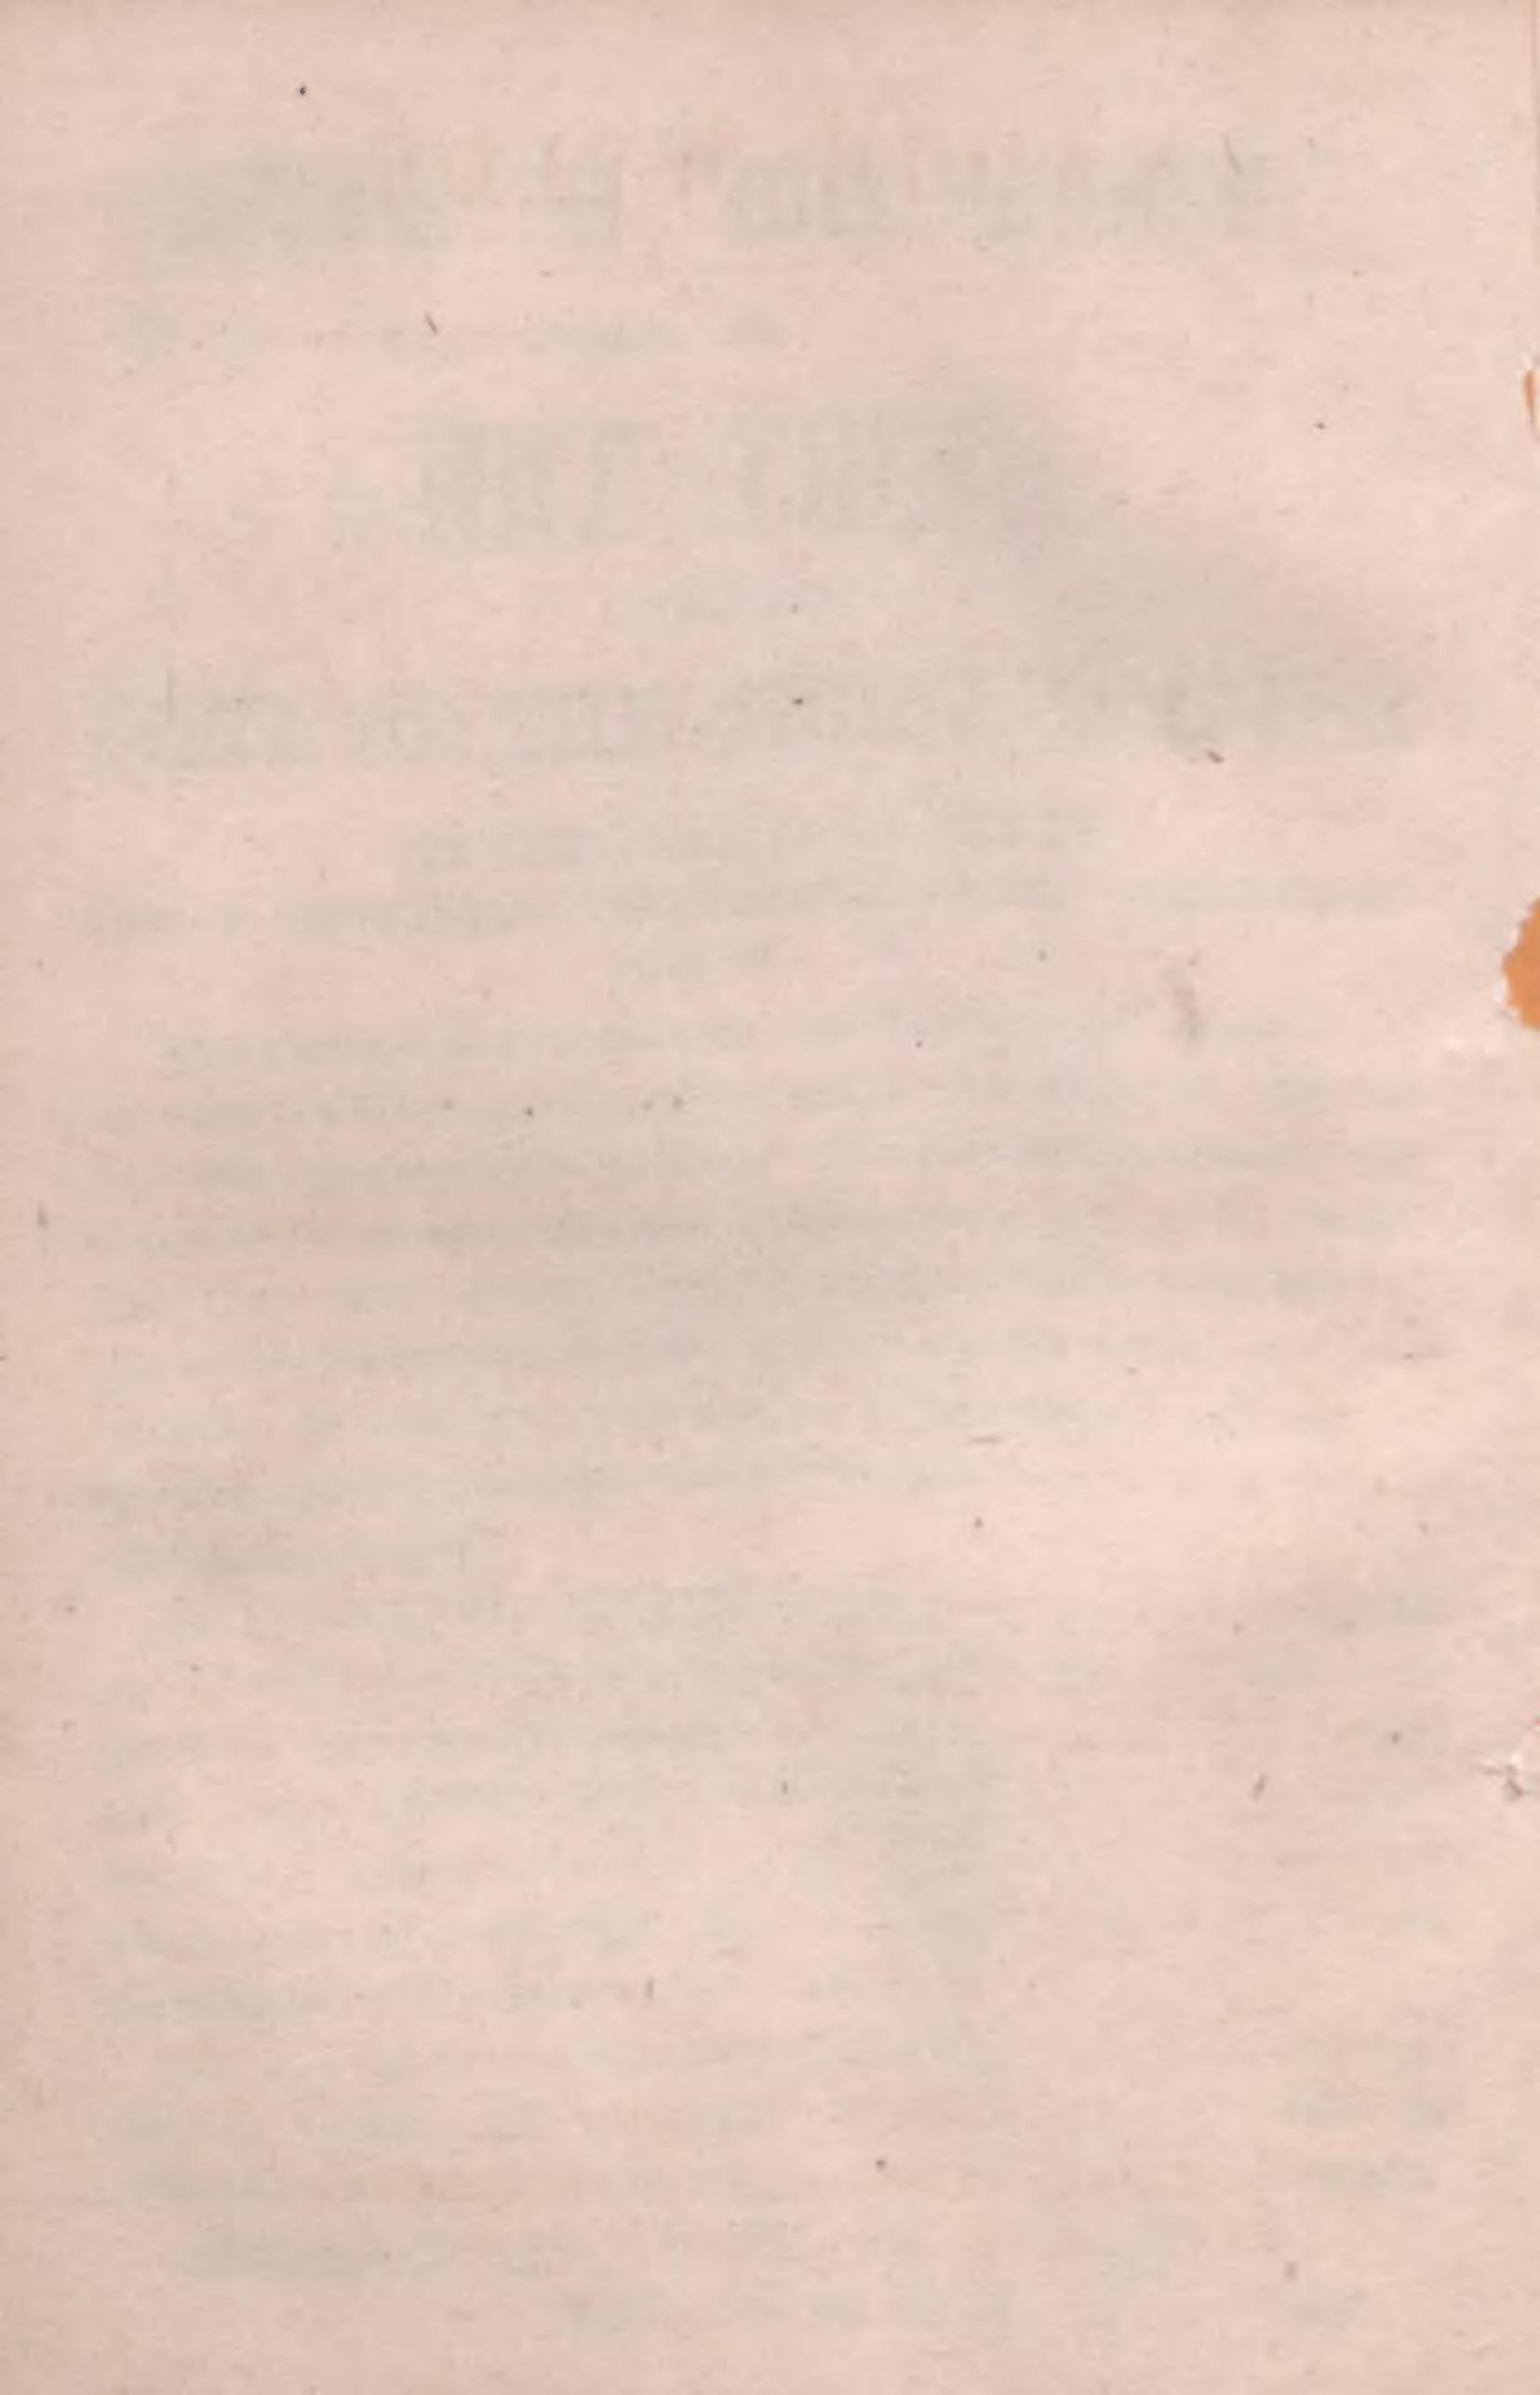

His pursuit is for a white girl, a captive among the Sioux Indians, by whom she was taken in her childhood. Nat Todd gets upon her "trail," and pursues it regardless of consequences. At the moment of most appalling danger he encounters the Trapper, Bill Biddon, who, it appears, also is in search of the captive. Together they then pursue their adventures, and are eventually successful, though the glorious Biddon "goes under" in the end.

This story is such as will command itself to every class and condition of readers. It will delight all, and certainly will take its place in our literature as one of its choicest and most popular books.

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 141 William Street, New York.

THE THE PERSON OF THE PERSON OF CHILDREN STREET, WILLIAM

MADGE WYLDE,

AVEG S

YOUNG MAN'S WARD;

OR,

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF ORPHAN LIFE.

"CLIFTON," "PRIDE AND PASSION," ETC.

NEW YORK:

BEADLE AND COMPANY, PUBLISHERS,

141 WILLIAM St., CORNER OF FULTON.

MADGE WYLLDE

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1861, by

BEADLE AND COMPANY,

in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York.

CIRLAW SIMANE FINISH

MADGE WYLDE:

THE

YOUNG MAN'S WARD

CHAPTER I.

PARADISE SQUARE.

WE lived in Paradise Square—Nan Briggs and I. Every-body knows where that is now, thanks to the kind offices and good works of the men who, several years ago, took their charity into its degraded precincts.

But at the time of which I write, few ever ventured into those gloomy haunts, except the utterly degraded, the starving and altogether wretched, who had been dragged lower and lower into vice and infamy, and finally landed in Paradise Square. I am not about to enter into any description of its appearance, or of its miserable inhabitants—God knows I have not any desire to call up more memories of that time than are absolutely needful to my story.

It is enough to know that when fate flung me there, the "Old Brewery" flourished as in its most iniquitous days—riot and murder walked openly there—hunger and crime fought for dominion over the lost souls gathered within it, and there were no good angels to fight upon the other side.

In the darkest corner, and in one of the most miserable rooms of all the dark dens in the struggling row of decayed houses, dwelt old Nan Briggs and I.

She was not my mother—thank heaven for that! She had no claim upon me nor I on her. My mother died in her room, and Nan had kept me with her from that time; perhaps to further ends of her own—possibly from one of those undefined impulses of humanity which sometimes actuate the most hardened and degraded.

Who I am, I never really knew-I never shall. When drink had made Nan good-natured, she used to tell me that my mother was a "real lady;" but want and misery, perhaps sin, I cannot tell, had brought her down to Paradise Square to There she did die, and old Nan kept her for the sake of a few valuables-a gold cross and ring, a broken ornament or two, which still remained to her-relics of a time gone by, of which, during her last hours, she raved brokenly, but without throwing any light upon her history.

I can remember when she died. I remember many things she taught me, although I was but a little child. During her illness I learned to read out of an old book that appertained to Nan, who pronounced "larnin' a fine thing," and prophesied that one day I should be a great lady.

My poor mother died at last, though, in her cross humors, Nan used to tell her it took her a great while, and they buried her-where I do not know-ask the city council where paupers are put. My mother found rest at length, and whatever her sins may have been, I have no fear to leave her in the hands of Him "whose judgment is not as the judgment of men."

For a year after her death-at least I think it must have been about that time, although I had no means or knowledge of keeping count-I swept the street-crossings. All day I wielded my broom on busy old Broadway, watching the splendid carriages go by, and the magnificently dressed ladieswho never would see me, however urgent I might be-saunter past; peering in at the great windows of the shops; sharpening my hunger by staring at all manner of delicacies in the confectioners' casements; forgetting my chilled limbs by marveling at the beautiful sights on every side, or trotting up and down the pavement to keep the blood from freezing in my shrunken veins.

When night came, I carried home to Nan my day's earnings. Sometimes they consisted only of a few pennies; but occasionally a tiny bit of silver gleamed out among the coin, and when the old woman saw that, she would clutch it with a terrible specter of a laugh, praising me as a bright, honest girl. Sometimes I was so unfortunate as to receive nothing, or my little store would be wrested from me by some sister sweeper, stronger and wickeder than I, and under such circumstances Nan used to beat me; but I do not remember that I cared much for it—indeed, the most brutal treatment would have been preferable to the loathsome caresses she occasionally bestowed upon me in her fits of maudlin intoxication.

She was terribly filthy; so, I suppose, was I; but I thought very little about those things. One duty Nan would insist upon, but it was because it was for her own benefit. My hair was very long and singularly black; she made me smooth it carefully every morning with an old brush she had by some means become possessed of, and which had once evidently been devoted to household purposes, and leave the tresses to stream down my shoulders, hanging far below my waist in a waveless, heavy mass. I believe Nan and I occasionally battled over that interesting ceremony; for my superabundant locks were a source of great annoyance to me, inasmuch as certain other young Bohemians were accustomed to pull them unmercifully, and the newsboys had an aggravating way of shouting, "There goes wild Madge," whenever I passed with my black hair streaming out in the wind. But my singular appearance gained me many extra coppers, as Nan well knewand Nan was very acute where her interests were concernedtherefore I was not permitted in any way to change it.

So I swept the crossings day after day, while my long hair grew longer, and I waxed thin and tall, till I must have been twelve years old, or somewhere about that age. I do not suppose that I was any better than the degraded children around me; but I recollect that no fear of a beating would induce me to tell a lie or commit a theft, though Nan often warned me that if I did not learn "to prig" I might expect a terrible punishment.

I had nothing to do with the little imps of my own age; I hated them, and they returned the sentiment with interest, taking their revenge by shouting names as I passed, flinging mud at me, and assailing me in every way that their miserable fancies could suggest; but sometimes old Nan would sally out from some unexpected corner where she had lain in wait, and scatter my foes to the right and left, giving me a final cuff as she drove me into the house, by way of teaching me to avoid quarrels in future.

After all, I have to thank old Nan—in her way she cared for me as well as she was able. She was hardly human, either in mind or body—a mass of ignorance and uncleanness—but I do believe that somewhere in her anatomy she had once possessed certain womanly impulses, dwarfed, crushed, and altogether blighted during her long, sinful life.

But a change awaited me in the midst of that want and wretchedness, though I suppose I had no warning of its approach—it is people of a higher grade than street-sweepers who can afford or understand the luxury of presentiments. But a change was at hand, and this was the way in which it came to me:-

I was one morning standing at the corner of Broadway and one of the cross-streets, watching the busy crowd that swept heedlessly past like the varied shapes of a phantasmagoria, when a young man reined his horse up to the curbstone where I stood, and, dismounting, flung the bridle to a ragged boy and entered a shop near. I stood looking at the noble animal as he champed his bit impatiently, tossed his proud head and scattered the specks of foam over the torn coat of the urchin who held him. Several moments passed, and I, careless of everything else in my delight at the impatient movements and restless spirit of the horse, remained motionless on the curbstone until his rider again appeared.

He hurried by, of course, without noticing me; but my eyes fastened themselves upon his face with an interest and degree of observation which would have impressed those features upon my memory for years—even in that depth of ignorance in which all my faculties were locked, I had a wild admiration which all my faculties were locked, I had a wild admiration thing beautiful that crossed my method.

tion for every thing beautiful that crossed my path.

He was still a mere youth; but his frame was so slender and lithe, his face so full of pride and boyish grace, his garments so tasteful and rich, that if I had ever heard of kings, I should immediately have decided that he must be one.

The chill spring wind swept through my thin garments, blowing my hair about my face; but I was unmindful of the cold, and stood watching him as he took the bridle from the boy's hand, and flung him a piece of silver as his reward.

He laid his hand upon the glossy neck of the horse, put one foot into the stirrup, and was just giving a vigorous spring which should place him in his scat, when a leaded omni's drew up so idenly in front. The horse started, gave a quick plant, and would have thrown the youth under his feet had I not spring forward and enight the bridle in my hand, helding it firmly in spite of the animal's struggles, until the rider could extricate himself.

I was unconscious that I had done any thing worthy of praise, and was greatly surprised at the encomiums which all around lestowed upon the act. I heeded no one else, however, when he turned toward me with his quick, flashing glan w.

"My brave girl!" he exclaimed, his haughty face softening into a smile so bright and beautiful that it seemed to bring all the charm of early boyhood back to his features; but he was very pale, and his right arm hung motionless at his side. "Here is some me ney," he continued, in a thinter tone; "take it; I can't step, i'r I find that I have sprained my wrist—had it not hen for you I might have been killed outright."

"I don't want the money," I replied, quite grieved that he should have offered it to me. "Old Nan can't beat me for not having taken it, because she won't know I could have earned so much."

For the first time he really locked at me, and with a glance of a traislanent either at my singular appearance, or my unexpected refusal of the money.

I must have been a strange-boding child. My complexion was dark, sallow from unwhol some for land ill health; my eyes of a deep blue, appearing unnaturally large from the attenuation of my features, and the contract with my long, 11 k hair that feated he so over my nock and tatt red cleak.

"Who is chi Nan F' he ash I, sull haly.

The question surprised met Every tody in our all y ha w Nan Britas, and met people for the rest for the world could be important of her existence.

"You don't know Non?" I said wenderingly; "why, I have lived with her for ever so long."

"Very position" he replied, with a light laugh, "but I nor had the honor of hearing her name before. Is she your mother?"

I shook my head, and the tears come into my eyes; I never could think of my lost perent without crying.

"My mother was a lely," I sail, indignantly, for I had always prided myself upon that fact of which Non had informed me, and held myself letter than my follow-hag as in consequence—"but she died a great while ago."

"Have you any friends?

"I've nobody but old Nan; she whils no sem times—but I don't mind that—she says it's good for children."

He muttered something to hims E and his country nece

"I cannot stay now," he said. "Come here to-merrow, you little wild Indian-if I am not here, come ardin."

He attempted to mount his horse, but grew very white, and leaned against a lamp-post for support.

"Hallon, Amory!" exclaimed a young man several years older, halting opposite; "what the dense is to pay here?"

"I have hurt my wrist confound lelly," he reall. I. " Suppose you ride my home home and I will get into an annilus; I feel very weak."

His friend complied, and I had a consciousnes, by the way, that the youth turned from me as if he did not with the other to observe that he had been conversing with me. I did not marvel thereat—I do not now—I have learned that it requires great courage to brave the world's snor!

"Remember what I told you, children," he said turning toward me again after the hore and its rid rid little in the "You are an odd figure, I must say—how come said at heing bird with those feathers?"

He hailed an omnibus, and, with a partie of the partie of the remind me of his command, entered it and was driven registry from my sight.

CHAPTER II.

A GREAT CHANGE.

No more, that day, did I sweep the crossings. I walked down the crowded thoroughfure completely oblivious to every thing around. Several times I brushed against ladies, who pulled their rich garments away with harsh words, as if there had been fear of contagion in my very touch. At last I sat down upon the stone steps which lead to St. Paul's stately church, and the afternoon had wern away before I stirred.

What my thoughts were I cannot tell—a strange jumble, doubtless; I know I often had such as perplexed me screly.

I went home that night with no money; and Nan's good humar was not increased when she learned what a sum I might have earned; I was, of course, too wise to have teld her, but she heard the circumstance from an old ragman who, was on by me, had with so I the whole proceeding. It is very probable that I might have had another beating to record, had not her anger had appeared by my telling her that I was to meet the centlem in on the following day.

I was only disputched to bed without having received my accustemed crust; but I som for at hunger and cold in recalling the wenterful event of the day, and looking eagerly forward to the morrow.

I had no project—no ilea of what might happen, as a less ignorant child would have had; to me, even the thought of a rain so ing and speaking with any human being so elegant and marvelous as that youth, was dream enough.

Famine and cold had often kept me awake, but never so leng as did those vague fineles which followed me into my dreams, and lent them a beauty they had never known before—as fir removed from the dull misry of my existence as would have been some wenderful Hastern tale.

The next morning I was stationed on the corner long but a the appointed hour; but I waited in vain—the stranger did not appear. I was going away quite over me with with, when some one touched my arm.

"What do you want?" I askel, sallenly.

"Do you live with old Nan?" quetion d the view

I turned quickly and saw an cll rly man in a livery-I learned afterward it was so called -standing being me.

"Yes, I live with her," I replied; "and I cannot the guidennan's horse," I added, for it occurred to my mind that he had been sent in search of me.

"You're the very one I want then," he continued; "Moster Easton couldn't come out, so he must needs some me, and a nice errand it is, I don't think! You are just to fill we me, you young blackamoor—at a respectful distance, mind, the orbit, for I don't care about being seen in this sort of company."

Without a word I obeyed him, cardess of his relation, fillowing in his footsteps a long distance up Brandway, until he went down the basement-steps of a large, magnificant has a

He bade me stay in the hall, and went up string.

In a few moments he returned and again or led me to follow him. I ascended the stairs, per although a treat hall, which looked more grand than my varieties of heaven, mounted another staircase, and entered a remain the upper story. I paid no attention to its spland r, for height a low couch, lay the young stranger.

"So, here you are!" he exclaim I, throwing down at the had been reading. "Well, we must make a change in your appearance before any one classes you. It like," he continued to the man, "have somebly that her adress. Tell them to wash her and make her tily; then ask my acut to here?"

come here."

The man bowed respectfully, darted a book of discuss at my appearance, took me out and consigned me to the hands of a won-lering and indignant housemail.

In an hour I was led back to that me mife at rome made dread, my face clean, my hair smooth and shining, but stal falling in heavy meas about my wait. I shruth had not the threshold, for a hely was sitting there, and near here the proud-looking girl, who surveyed me with targetime in him.

The young gentleman bade me advance, and his voice reas-

The lady regarded me for an instant through her glass, then exclaimed:

"I don't wonder you were struck, Easton; upon my word, I believe she's a gipsey. What is your name, little girl?"

"Madge Wylde," I answered, unawed by her manner, for

I was not timid after the first moment of surprise.

"A very fit name," she said. "Would you like to live with me, and learn to read and sew?"

"And wait on me," put in the girl; "you said she should, mamma."

"Yes, yes, my dear," returned the lady quickly, for the youth on the soft made a hasty movement; "that can be easily settled hereafter. Would you like to live here?" she added to me.

"If old Nan is willing," I replied; "but if you don't pay her, she will get me away from you. Don't let her do that—oh, don't !"

"You need not be afraid," said the boy. "Be a good girl, and try to learn every thing you are bid, and old Nan shall never have you."

He whispered a few words to the lady, who replied aloud:

"You are such a willful creature—however, have your own way! Indeed, I dare say we shall find the little thing quite useful. Louise," she continued to the girl, "arrange your cousin's cushions; he is not comfortable. I am grateful, Easten, that you escaped with a sprain and a slight lameness."

"We have to thank that little sprite for it," he said, smiling at me.

Quick as she had speken, and before the lifeless-looking girl could obey her mother's command, I sprang forward and settled the pillows in a more comfortable position.

"I think you will find her sufficiently forward," was Miss Loui e's comment; but her speech received no response, and there was something in her cousin's eyes that checked any further display of temper.

an instant, can him; his glance; "she does so love to do every thing for you herself—she is even jedous of me—I never saw any one so tender-hearted."

"I am very grateful to her," he replied carelessly, and changing his position with a yawn. "How tiresome it is to be shut up in the house—this morning has some! Iller a week!"

"But this child"—sail the lady, as if sudleady returning to a consciousness of my presence. "Rollins must 20 with her to her home, pay the horrid creature she has lived with her price, and get her away. We leave town 50 seen that she can obtain no clue to our whereabouts, if she repents."

"I should not think she would be likely to do that," alled the young girl.

The cousin glanced at her again.

"She looks like one of Murillo's pictures," he said; "her head is exquisitely shaped."

The girl darted a spiteful glance at me, and langue loutright, but her mother interposed between the two.

"She had better go back at once, had she not, East n?"

"I think so, madam. I must tell R llins to harn every thing he can about her."

"Oh, I've no doubt you will hear some won krisk remande," rejoined Louise; "perhaps she is an eachanted prin -- s."

"She looks like one," replied her cousin coally; "si han out-of-the-way face—really it is quite refreshing to see sum-thing so picturesque and original."

The lady rose and rung the lall, as if annials to put an end to the conversation. The man who had conducted me to the house appeared in answer to her summans, and we called to go with me to my old home for the purpose of hardwing with old Nan concerning my departure.

"Don't leave the child," said the youth. "Pay the clib har whatever she asks, so that there may be no nor re trailed. ...

ît."

The man promised implicit obedience, and the it medianes stairs again to the housemail, who put on me a pretty be next and shawl, and then we set forth.

Old Nan had no objection to partine with me, privillast, was paid her price. In ice i, she generously was not my mother's cross, a moment after dominitian to be paid its full value, patted my head while she waved that I might thank her and the bringing-up she had given me for my good fortune, and allowed me to depart.

Nan and I met no more. From that day my destiny took unto itself new paths, spreading out in a far different direction—whether for happiness or misery the future only could tell.

I returned to that stately mansion and its haughty eccupants, almost stupefied by the suddenness and magnitude of the change which had come over me. Of course, I did not speculate as an older person would have done; but I was full of strange, will thoughts, and among others would come recollections of my mother's death, and the dismal room where her life went out, introduce themselves upon me in the rich changler where I set, like beggers entering a festal hall.

I was startled at the gran lear around me; I thought there were many Madge Wylles beside me as the mirrors reflected my image. The soft carputs seemed never meant to be trodden—every thing was so gorzeous and beautiful that I could not believe it real. But, young as I was, and delefully ignorant, too, something told me that Louise was watching my amazement with scornful pleasure, and I carefully repressed it.

CHAPTER III.

MY NEW HOME

THREE days after, we left the city, and for the first time in my life I enjoyed the delight of rilling in a carriage. I went in the vehicle with Mrs. Amery, her danker and negliew, although at first the lady had been at a less where to just me. It was Easton's decision that settled the matter, as it appears to decide every thing in which he chose to interest him lil

"You do not mean her to associate with the structs. Sie is to be brought up a companion for Louise-a sert of assidily uscless ornament to your beulbir; therebry he plar wil re she may learn good manners-though they some materal enough to her."

So I went in the carriage with them. I can let back upon no season of such keen enjoyment as that in which I then reveled. I had never been in the Country befor, and our way led along that most majestic liver of our New World, every step revealing some unexpected builty and marvel, filling my eyes with tears and my hart with on tions painful from their very sweetness, until I land back in my seat sick, and faint with excitement.

I knew that we were going to Mrs. Am ry's contract, where she intended to pass at lest a partin all the similar, and my poor, undeveloped sort part I with j wat the till till with of spending whole months among the great trackling the ful flowers. I was not noticel a great deal, the same, several times, I clasped my hands and utterd singlition of astonishment or a limitation at the variets is a stresented to my gaze, Easten weald be a milingly at me, and the languid ludy, bug past a limiting any this a, we all says "Is not her enthusiasm delicitus? So out of the way un!

piquant!"

Miss Louise occasionally in lalged in a few worth, of contompt, or a little succeing lanch; but somehow her cousin always checked her vapid insolence or merriment, and I was allowed to in lubra my excited feelings in any way I saw fit.

We role all day; then the young lady chose to fancy herself ill, and we were obliged to spend the night at a little town who e name I do not remember. The next morning Amory proper late his aunt that we should pursue our jourmy in the stambeat that touched there, and she at once consented.

I shall never forget my emotions as we drove down to the lin ling and went on board of the beat. Since then I have so a noble ships of every nation upon the bread occur—have looked on all that is grand or lovely in our country—all that is fand toor wonderful in the old world—but nothing ever awalened such follows as I experienced when I felt myself glidars smoothly over the waters in that graceful beat.

Miss Lenie graciously rave me her bag and several books to held, while, at her mother's request, her consin off red her his arm for a promenate on decia. Mrs. Amory rethed to the calin, and I was left to gaze in sil nee on the heatiful views which every moment opened in new lovelines her reus.

How I has elto stand up a the runnits of the mountains rid; to blue and distinct in the distance—to let my all contly down among the featherstell wat as and that early along after the white-winged birds skimming about as like shadows, Heaven appeared very near the elefty poles; and all my life I had had such will thereies of going thither in earch of my lost mother.

The less own it rapilly on, and In a f wan mosts we real about the least replaced switch the late ville ville reached the carrier, part is switch the jutting win sand about the smooth root, until I saw the jutting win sand late china years a large her a up nour right hand.

It proved to be our place of desiration; for, quitting the historiary, we passed through the meant iron outs, up a winding drive, bordered on either side with tall trees that interlaced their branches everly. I, a metimes desired in a sight of the learn and river alter ther; then, upon new him a sublem rise of ground, the gray rest would be mup again, and the bright waters dance in the sunlight, while my heart leavel at the sight of them.

The house stood upon an eminence, built of durk-ray stone, with spreading wings and broad veranils, pricitly covered with fragrant vines just burstian into blance.

A smooth, broad lawn swept from the stips down to the beginning of the avenue; on the right had lower an immune flower garden, while at the left and both a first old word, stately with primeval pines and head the river.

I could catch glimps of the waters from the veranta, sweeping away in a succession of beautiful windings until a sublen curve and jutting child shot the last glam from view, miles and miles above.

The interior of the dwelling was in hoping with its surroundings. A great half divided it in the cut r, will ning in the middle to an arched room, where a specialize fount in threw up its spray, and fall with a sweet, the far sometime a marble basin below. Glass do rs, at the lattle rank, the egress to a lawn corresponding with the chell in it at a positive great the fall a wast marble pile rate in facility with the section.

There were many specious apartin his, crowded with all the luxuries that wealth could provide or a rule of the provide or a rule of the provide of the provi

I was regarded half as a pet, trovid hours, profit i with pretty garments, tought such this reason with a few showy at my limits; yet made all the while to feel that I two none and my hard factor there was an immense gulf, over which I could now recross.

A portion of each day was count in Mrs. Am ry's drainer room, sometimes following the best of my own in Heat. In looking at books of engravines, or playing childhan, as my fancy suggested; at others, subject to the option of Lair, who was at one moment hind and galler and, the maxt so irritable and exacting that I could do nothing to please her.

She was completely spoiled by her mother's induly nee; a constrained to the gratification of every caprice, however extravarant and ridiculous it might be, so that it was not perhaps alterether her fault that she was growing proud, hanchty, and vain; for, under the best and most consistent government, she would always have been a weak, frivolous character.

Histon Amory remained several weeks at Woodl rock, then he left us quite unexpectedly. From him I always received him he seemed attention; although, after a time, he consider the field me much in his number presence, as it was evidently unpleasant to her.

But very often I encountered him in the grounds; then he would sit down by me, and talk in his reckless, deshing way, all arently not regarding me as a child; and, indeed, though i morant, and younger than Louise, I was, in many things, her superior—I felt it even then.

The governess, who, I learned, had been on a visit to her family, now returned, and she gave me lessons daily, when these of Louise were over; as she was a kind women, and devoted herself assiluously to my improvement, I make a progress that was periodly astonishing; and was soon quite the equal of Louise in all such studies as it was easil red proper for me to pursue.

I was posionately fend of pictures, and, whenever I could stall into the gall ry, where a fine collect in hung, I spent hours in gazing upon them, we ping often, and talking to them as if they could understant my love and a limitation.

I had received no instruction in drawing, but I used to sit for hours with a paneil and paper, analong sketches, which, then hours and ill formed, showed more than an ordinary degree of talent for one so young.

I was sitting in a window-at, in the upper hall, one day, builty occupied with some marvelous production, when Easton chanced to pass.

"What on earth are you alout?" he askel.

Halit been any one classical who made the demand, I should have hill not the sheet; but much as I loved him, I did not dare, for I was a period slave to his wishes; o I relied, faintly:

"Nothing at all."

"Nothing at all," he replied; "you certainly have a very industrious way of weaking at a dhing. It is not a what you are at—nonsense, child, don't be abid?"

He took the paper from me with a manner he had oven in the slightest act, which clearly showed how entirely he had been accustomed to have every one around saturit to his last wish.

He looked at the drawing for a moment without speking; claimed others which lay in my lop; that of at the rin the same unusual silence; while I sat wat thing him with anxious eyes, as if sentence of life or doubt hung up a his lips.

"Who taught you?" he asked, at length; "Mis Western,

I suppose."

"Nobody taurkt me," I replied; "I culy to them because I like to, oh, so much."

"Whew I" he exclaimed.

"Don't take them away from me," I said, "pleased in take doesn't do any harm, you know."

"I should think not, in led-why put are a little live genius-I suppose you know what that is."

"Of course I do-I was realist at the the chief the

"And you are taking pattern alt r him?"

"I don't know what you mean—; has live me my plant, Haston, I want to finish it before a made by calls has a may to do something else."

At this moment Mrs. Amory can up stairs. I make movement to seize and hide my drawing, but Extended in above my reach.

"Aunt," he said, "look at this."

She took the sketches with her used strily in the patter, looked at them for a moment, and sold, employed in the side.

"Louise really draws very well; she has inthe triat in every thing she undertaken. Dill she live you thing Make in

"Louis !" exclaimed Laston, alm i out the sly.
"Excuse me, makin, but shy could not draw as a distribute her soul."

"Who did them then?" she witch have a thing the stray of the Western couldn't have drawn these craims thing."

"There sits the artist," replied Easton, pointing to me, laughing a little bit, with a certain degree of exultation in his tone.

Mrs. Amory gave me an anary glance, while the color shot into her pale cheeks.

"Who gave you be ons?" she askel.

"No one, madam," I answered. "Please don't be angry-indeed, I didn't mean any harm."

Sie gave me the drawings without a word, and turned away, but Easton did not follow.

"My friend," said she, looking back, with one of her sweetest smiles, "I thought you promised to make some calls with Louise and me—have you forgotten?"

"By no means—I am quite really. But we must have Mis Western teach this young sprite; she certainly exhibits great telent."

"Very well, it shall be attended to; but just now-"

"Ah, here is Miss We tern," pursued Elaston, heelies of his aunt's impatience, as the governess came down from the school-reem. "Look at these drawings," he continued, placing them in her hand; "you must take great pains with her—prings we have found an artist."

"Do you wish me to give Malge lessons in drawing, making asked the governes, turning toward Mrs. Amory, with her accustomed composure.

"Of course, of course," replied H. ton, left re Lis munt could Sprik; "that is what I am saving."

Mr. Amony looked exectively annoyed; but there was som thing in H. thus there which should not choose to contradict.

"I have no objection," the said, coluby. "Make, I do not like your chains of a sait; please remove yourself to the school-room—or no, you may go to my chamber, and wind the silk that lies on the table."

As Exton Amory handed his aunt down stairs, I heard him hough in a tantalizing way, and she replied to it in a low, quick voler; but I did not exten the words. I know there was a mething and a although I hardly understood what, in Miss Western was recording me with the sad I of she often bestowed upon my face.

"Oh, Mins Western," I excluimed, importuously, "isn't it nice! I want to begin right away—this very moment."

"You have the silk to wind first."

"That won't take any time at all, you know, and I want to begin so bad."

"Bring the skeins into the school rom," she replied, kin lly, "as soon as you have wound them. I will give you a first lesson."

"Oh, I am so glal! Let me his yeu, Miss Western, let me kiss you right off."

The governess bent down to receive my caress, and, standing up an instant, with her hand lightly placed on my head, she continued:

"Do not forget to be grateful to the kind friends among whom you have fallen-let it be your study to place them-and above all, thank God heartily for his an income."

"I do," was my reply; "I pray for Blattu and all of them every night."

" Mr. Easton," suggested the governes, goldy.

"No," returned I stordly, "he gave he have to call him so only the other day."

"When you are a little older you will learn that it is not proper," she said.

" But I like it best."

"I think Mrs. Amory would not like it," she replied, "and you would be sorry to displease her."

I did not understand at all why it could clim! Mrs. Amery, but I was too busy with my proposed strikes to think much about the matter.

After that I received instruction daily; and, he is many months, Miss Western predicted woulderful things for mo.

CHAPTER IV.

THE YOUNG STRANGER.

Easton Amony left Woodbrook soon after that little scene; and as, during several weeks following, the house was crowded with company, I was allowed to wander about at my pleasure.

I received lessons regularly from Miss Western, but Louise could hardly be induced to look at a book. Young as she was, a love for every species of dissipation was the strongest foling in her nature. Her soul was not more than half-formed; such figulties as she posses a lower be note than partially developed, but she loved thatery and excitement, and was never in good humor unless her mother permitted her to be dressed and among the visitors.

I was, of course, s at for but soliom. Occasionally, Louise would take it into her wise heal to use her embrois ry-frame, and would have me at hand to sort and wind silks; but that was from a desire to make me feel my dopendace. I have it would have placed her had I revoked, and to neared into eledinee; so never, by worder look, did I betrey how, child though I was, such servitable called my provide prict.

At other times, after my beens were over, I develop be everallicars to drawing; then Mile Western would insit upon my leaving it; so I would take a beak-checking these followed primes—with a refliction that prime filter we distinct the pions of the western in that delivered the complete this is a like on the prime beat the first that the branches of the old trees, can be in rilly upon the processward, or line on I, like a the deep on my tooked, that ache them the strangeness and into a by of them its which I had no power to comprehend.

One day I had nearly reached the Ferniaries of the center; for, on that sid, Mrs. Amory's lands terminated with the woods. I had been annoyed by one of Louis's displays of temper, and, as so n as I could releas myself, had harried of into that her is a cif into that lonely retreat.

I threw asile my bonn t, I hay hair struct once more after its off untilly fishion, which was no letter permitted, and raced wildly up and down, such a the rule is to retreat, and chains the butteril's as they also be part of tired myself fairly out at length, and buy down up a the arms to rest, thy twitting my hair nearly and results are like the after a habit I had, and harly watching the study are like tree-tops.

At last, a step sounded flaintly on the arms turn; has I did not look up, supposing it to be one of the man cashing at all at the place.

"Radly," sall a voice I did not know, "I wenter if the grove is haunted? This is the first that in yours that I have set my foot here, and I didn't expect to be treated to the solution of a wood-nymph."

I spring to my feet at once, and so I haling at the speaker in astonishment, but with ut any for.

He was a youth, apparently about the least East a finery, but unlike him in every respect. He was rather published fair, with large, any opes, a mouth that spile man it is well-ness and determination, and sur, wayy, brown hair, of that peculiar golden has so solden show, but which is so be acted. I have seen such hair but once sines; then it allowed the latter head of genius. The face was not hard meantable small he small; then it lit up so brightly, and his great opes were pulsed and varied in their expression, that it but his actuary and mother than more beauty.

"You need not look at me with so not he at all affail."

"Afraid!" I repeated, with a could a land and a land a land and a land a land and a land a land and a land and a land a land and a land a land and a land a lan in my tone; "why should I be?"

He laughed a little, in said to lead to the least the fatirue of a sharp run. Then his manner I was the thought me older than I really was, it is based in least the later than I really was, it is based in least the later than I might have easily.

"I thought at the type with my cond. I have "he cantinual; "but when I away a randle like the like a particular be; she is altogether to he will a like to each exertion."

exertion."

"Your cousin Louise!" I returned, staring at him in new astonishment. "How comes she to be your cousin?"

"Very easily; but did you never hear me spoken of?" he continued, with much earnestness. "Indeed, I am astonished at my aunt's neglect. I wish she could see me here this moment—what a way she would be in!"

"Who are you?" I asked, abruptly, quite losing sight of the principles of courtesy, which Miss Western so diligently instilled into my mind, in my wonder at his sudden appearance and singular words.

"You speak like the lady of the manor," said he, laughing at the air I had unconsciously assumed; then, taking off his cap, he made me a low bow, and 'added: "Be it known to you, worshipful maiden, that I am your unworthy servant, Walter Stuart."

"And you are Louise's cousin?"

"I have that honor; and add thereto that of being nephew to her serene mother, whom I conclude you are visiting."

"No," I replied, not caring how quickly any one learned my real position; "I live with her—she took me away from old Nan Briggs, and I have been here ever since."

The smile flided from his lip, and a graver expression stole over his face; somehow, young as he was, it seemed more natural to it than the merry look it had worn a moment before.

"Better have left you with old Nan!" he muttered. "How came she to find you?"

"I saved Easton from falling off his horse, so he persuaded his aunt to take me," I said.

"Hum!" was his doubtful rejoinder. "I remember hearing that my delectable cousin had met with an accident."

"Is he your cousin, too?" I asked.

"We have the happiness to hold that relationship to each other," he replied. "Do you think him handsome?" he asked, quickly.

"Yes; much handsomer than you," I replied, an prily, so irritated by his tone that I grew hot and rel.

"We won't quarrel about looks, Miss-what shall I call you?"

[&]quot;My name is Madge Wylde."

"A very appropriate one! They did not give you the name also, I conclude."

"Certainly not. I suppere I may have a name as well as other people."

"I should be sorry to prevent you," he relied, with the same mock respect, which left me un belied which the red be vexed or to laugh. I sensibly decided upon the latter, and as he joined in my mirth, we soon became excilent friend, falling into a long and interesting conversation upon a veri ty of topics.

"Do you live near here?" I asked, at harth.

"The next place to this; those are our grounds up in the other side of the wall."

"Why do you never visit your aunt?" I question i, builty.

old bantering tone.

"Why do you?" I persisted.

"Because I don't wish to," he answered, blandly; "nor would they thank me for my visit, if I made one. Indeed, I suppose if Mrs. Amory could see me here this manual, she would order the dogs set upon me."

"What have you done?" I asked, lasking surjici nely at him.

- "So it follows that the fault must be mine, des it?" he asked.
- "What was it?" I persisted, with all the curnistness of my age.

"Nothing at all; I have not exclanged a word with any of them since I was a little child."

"Then you can't have any quarrel with the me," I are: 1.

"I am afraid you are not very werlily wise, Miss M. 'I," he said, smiling. "I can not explain the affair to you although you do demand it in such an ingrins way. Mrs.
Amory and we have not been friends to yours. Unless you wish to have your ears soundly boxed, I would not a living you to mention my name."

The conversation passed to other the mas, and, as was not iral at my age, very soon became as cinil lential as positive

"Do you come here often?" he ashel.

"Almost every day, when it is pleasant. I like to be in the woods, don't you?"

"Indeed, I do. I fairly live in our part of this old forest. Come with me, and I will show you my work. We must often have been neighbors without being aware of it."

I followed him to the low wall that separated the grounds, and sprung over after him, before he could make a movement to assist me.

"Upon my word," he said, "you can jump like a deer."

"Louise says it isn't ladylike," I said, blushing a little, for I was a sensitive child, in spite of my wild spirits.

"Never mind her; it would be a good thing for her to run about a little, and get some color in her wax-doll face."

"She says that it is aristocratic to be pale."

"With all my heart; and she shall be as aristocratic as she likes, only do not let her make you so."

"She is not likely to try it," I replied. "But where is your favorite place?"

"Very near here. Come this way."

We took a winding path through the woods, and soon came to a rustic summer-house, covered with blossoming vines and overhung by the great trees.

"What a pretty place," I said.

He conducted me into the arbor. There were low seats covered with moss—a flantastic table of the same rustle manufacture as the summer-house—books and papers were scattered about, all making up the most charming retreat possible to imagine.

"Do you like it?" he asked.

- "Oh, it is beautiful! There is nothing like this in our woods. I wish there was—such a pretty place to sit and read."
- "I hope you will come here very often, then, and bring your books," he answered.

"Oh, may I?"

"Of course you may, you little fairy."

- "Then I will. You will see me almost every pleasant day."
- "Very well; I am sure that I can not see you too often."

"And you live so near here?" I asked.

"Yes; you can see the house through the trees."

"But why don't you ever come to visit your aunt?"

"Because we are deadly enemies."

"How can that be?" I said, wenderingly. "Relatives are never enemies."

"Are they not?" he returned, laughing so midly. "I think they are very soldom any thing else."

"But it isn't right," I emp stul del.

"Nor is it my fault, little Malgo. But don't talk about them; I never wish even to think of their names. I would not have set foot in those grounds, but Brownie, my dog here, ran away, and I heard her manning so pitchesly that I thought she must be hurt, and came after her without thinking where I was."

"What a pretty dog she is," I said. "I found one has week, a nice little thing, and Mrs. Among this me that I might keep it, but Louise pretend I that she was afraid of the poor doggie, and screamed so every these it came hear her, that they made me send it away."

"Horrid little wretch!" he marmared "Nover mind, Madge; you shall come here and play with Branch who make you please; see, she has taken a fancy to you already, and Brownie seldom does to stranger. The Phys you a high compliment."

The little creature had bapad into my lap, and, after licking my hands for a time, curled hardle candinally up, and went fast to sleep.

"And you come here often?" I in mir 1.

"Oh, yes; I study here; you will always find no when the weather is time. Do you like pitter it its, M. her?"

I was insune about them, and when he put a volume of colored engravings in my hand, the meaning of my delicate was fall. He talked very him by to me, evined an intersting my childish conversation, and explain the planes to me, until I came to the condition that he must be very tearned in by 1—alm. I as wis as Herring at the condition of the condition of the many minds.

We stayed there until has in the after. in I had entirely forgetten that I might be want I in the hard

"I must go home, now," I said, when I remaind he we long I had been gone. "Mis Western will said me if I den't."

"Who is she?"

"The governess, you know."

"I did not; is she nice?"

"Oh, very nice; I love her so much."

"Well, if she is kind to you, all right."

"I will by Brownie on the moss," I said; "she will sleep there as nicely as possible. Good-by, now, Walter Stuart; what a pretty name you have got."

"Thank you, Madge; good-by. I shall expect you very soon again."

"May I come to-morrow?"

"The sooner the better. If I am busy, you can amuse yourself with a book."

"Oh, I won't disturb you; I'll be as still as a mouse."

"So be it! To-morrow then, little fairy."

"Yes, I'll come to-morrow," and away I bounded, quite delighted with my new friend.

CHAPTER V.

MIDSUMMER HAPPINESS.

SEVERAL days passed without my again steing Walter Stuart, for I was kept so busy in the house that I found no time for my accustomed rambles in the weeks. Leuis detained me, constantly waiting upon her—she had a slight illness, which she magnified, as she always did her ailment, into sickness, and I was kept near to graffly her whims.

I think Louise disliked me because I so for surposed her in natural quickness, and, like all mean matures, she never omitted an opportunity of gratifying her malicious disposition.

Among other trials, I was domed to complete a place of worsted-work that she had begun—a many-onland day, holding a basket of flowers in his mouth, of huss and shapes that would have astonished Flora could she have somether. The girl took delight in watching me and finding fault with my progress, forcing me to pick out the stitches a down that in succession, though, on each separate trial, they had been set exactly as she directed.

Passionate and flery I was, but I had early learned that nothing vexed Louise so much as to see med a ricitly unmayed by her taunts; so I heeded her ill-handr a that all, singing gayly at my work, and bodying quite happy and uncome rund, though, all the while, I was ready to spring out of the while with restlessness and impatience.

Her blue eyes would fairly bluze, and her delicate employion grow purple with passion, and so real times she struck me with her whole force, calling me by every in-diing name that her mean imagination could suggest.

So the weeks passel, and the leading mill man come on. Woodbrook put on all its beauties, and to me the place was like Paradice.

I mi sed Easton exceedingly, and his absolute was a source of great grief to me; but I never mentioned his name, though night after night I key in bed crying with a sort of vague unrest; and whenever I could gain access to the picture-gallery unperceived, spending hours before his portrait—talking to it, asking cornect of it, calling it my bed, my only friend.

When the clustering vines were most fragrant, the flowergardens in their riche t beauty, the depths of the great word greenest and most lovely, Mrs. Amory was scized with a sudden fever to depart. I heard her speak of a trip to Saratoga, and learned from Miss Western what and where it was, watching with silent wonder the preparations that went on, and marveling how she could tear herself from that beautiful spot.

Louis was to accompany her, and I ferred I should be compelled to go; but certain that the ill-natured girl would force me to act contrary to my desires, I occasionally whippered in her car of the happiness she would enjoy, and let her to infer, if she pleased, that I envial her anticipated pleasure. So Louise decided that I should remain where I was, although, once or twice, Mrs. Amory spoke of taking me.

"I wen't have her?" said her daughter; "inde I I wen't! Pe ple will be asking if she is any relation of mine—though, to be sure, we might dress her in a Turkish continue, and they would take her for a mulatto—she is thack enough, in all consciences!"

I made no reply, although I was furious. I did not hate the micrable creature; I filt too strongly her immountable intriority, and despised her taunts as much as the weak spirit that instituted them.

So they went away, and Mis We tern went to vielt her relatives—I was alone, with the exception of the servants. But Mrs. Armory saw it to import certain retrictions upon me; she had never quite forzetten her annoyance about the drawings. She decided, properly enough, that I must be taught to saw, and the househer per was in tructed, during extain hours of each day, to in fact me into the mysteries of needlework.

I was periodly happy during the month that followed. I attend I to my sowing every morning, and the rot of the day was at my own disposal; I could read, study, and, letter than all, draw as constantly as I saw fit. I know that I improved very rapidly; and I was so anxious that Easten should be pleased with my success when he returned.

During there weeks I he is ally saw Walter Struct. When sought my old hand in the weeks he would come to the I sion wall that separated Wester is he makes hand, and div. by name. I always globy the yell his invitation to visit call nomer-house, for I like I him with the in Amery than the sm ought of comparing him with Haston Amery than have then heaven. He was him, south, place and; but, in earth win Plaston was an thing so superior to any other my mind, not, that it would have been such so my faith to human becared the two.

have comporting had that Main his Lation at you at a lill wa' said he, as we sat, and day, in the art relies with that work, in which he had been realing to me, and I compled a book, fracting a handle relief in embroidate quite michile a l'Ireplial, hemblily; "I am doing it highed missiliar voly at my irritation, thing his book.

"You econer I wish to: it is no Miss West ru."

He had became playfully tracing the little deg that, as usual, aside, s his feet.

lay When is Edital Among coming back?" was his next " Not at all this summer, Miss Western toll me. He will return to college in the fall."

with the preparation be maked; he is off on a yachting-exoursion with a party of South races."

"I should intrine," I rail it, "that he would not very little preparation to do ony thing he will it

Walter Start amil I-his cil. pulm I sails. I went on with my work, and he had at he to a large time, then turned away, drawing a day broth.

"Poul Main!" he marinish, phylingly. "Pour little

Made 122

"Da't!" I will, while the tare to my eye; "my mether used to my that-it makes but ery."

He straked my hair serily, as a fir that might have a no, and his wife took for the straint to the said.

"I wish you has warp as the r; I wish you lived with her."

"Where is she?" I inquired.

"Gone to visit a sick relative; she left, unexpectably, the day after I first saw you. I would not go up, for I had my studies to look after; so I am alone in my castle, monarch of all I survey."

"You must be very rish," I said, "if you own this place; and the house, though not so large as ours, is quite as handsome."

A quick flush shot over his face—his eyes flashed, then grew mitty. He rese from the ground, and took two or three impatient terms acres the shorn turl in front of the summer house.

"Sometime," he will, at learth, coming back to my side, "I will tell you a long story; you are to young now to hear it."

"Is it a very sad one?" I asked.

"I do not know; rather sail for me, on some accounts, yet my mother says that, in the end, the very means employed to thwart my destiny may work me much good."

"I don't see how."

"That is because you do not know the story. But I must not stay here any longer, Million I do not suppose I shall come a sin for a great while. I am gring away."

"Where?" I asked, som what sarry, yet not much grived, except that he spoke mournfally.

"I have business away. Shall you miss me, Maker's

"I don't know," I replied, slowly. "Now's me propertied in don't miss at all, and others I hate to have leave me. Yes, I shall miss you."

"Whom don't you miss?"

"Louise, for one."

"No wender; the little plague! But now for the year dread to have have you—it appears I am not of the manier."

Esten Amory's name was on my lips, but a melow I could not bear to utter it. There was a following in my hour which had not bear to repeat its accents, though I chen while relation to myself.

"Do you make Amony?" asked Walter, while his line one I was I she help with the r Loke of resistion. "Ye pure line speak," he continued, throughly, almost hurshly; "the coff yours are such tell-tules, they have you the tradit, "Good-by, Madge-I am going now."

"Oh, stop! stop!" I exclaimed, as he hurried all, for I filt that he was angry, although I did not comprehend the reach; "don't go so—don't!"

He turned at my words, and came close to my sil.

"What is it, Madge?"

"You are not vexed with me? Don't co away anjry. Indeed, I shall miss you very much."

He stooped and smoothed my hair, in his matte care ling way.

"As much as Easton?" he asked.

I would not tell a lie, and I told him "No." He was not angry, not vexed, only sorrowfal. He hoked at me in the way that always brought teas to my eyes.

"Poer Madge!" he sighed; "poor little M.lee!"

He looked wistfully at my forched, in a money which, half been older, would have told me that he had been a lies there; but he made no movement to do so.

"Yes, I am sorry you are going," I said, that ing i rward to the loneliness of the weeks that lay before me. "I wish people never would go away—it's very stupil of them, I am sure."

He laughed a little, then repeated, more s rrowilly thin before:

" Poor Madge !"

His hand lingered, for a moment, upon my hair, his eyes looked with an earnest meaning into my own, then, he fee I could move or find words to speak from the tille of emitters that choked me, he was rone, and I sat within the vines wreathed arbor sorrowful and alone.

I was very sail for several days. I think I call have times, though it would have some hard with me if I had hen forced to declare wherefore, because I mas little had here.

I thought of Easten Amory, and yeared to so that I would have globly gone out into the world in the horizon, just as, years before, I longed, to go up to heave at 1 that my lost mother.

new charm for me—I live I and revoled in the late of the inings which they depicted. I illed no labor in the relation the —I form d for my-off a lastiful realm, possible with the Lines of my own fancy, and dwelt there blest in their com-

· So I live I and dreamed, sometimes sorrowful, sometimes glade quality unable to assign a reason for either emotion.

In a new weeks Mrs. Amory and her daughter returned, and, if a a time, the household resumed its old ways.

It was now autumn; for, after leaving the watering-place, they had spent sometime in traveling. I was growing old enough to discover that Mrs. Amory needed constant change and excit ment. She became restless and dissatisfied deprived of the empty of the extension of the excitence without their aid than an opium-cater deprived of his baleful, but exhibiting drugs.

Miss West in half also returned, kind and attentive as ever. She express the surprise and satisfaction at the improvement I half make, but I do not think Louise shared at all in the latter feeling. She considered it necessary to administer smilty lectures upon the folly of a beggar being reared as I was, and quoted a certain proverb concerning their equestrian that notes when placed on horseback; but I despised her more than ever.

"You look as much like a Hindoo as you always did," was nearly her first solutation. "Are you sure you haven't some cuthin lish it is hid away that you worship in delightful secreey?"

"Yes, I have, but you will never see them," I replied, filled still with my romance and poetry.

"I would in't a lyish you to be impertinent," she said, sharply.

"I only answered your question," I replied.

"You have no business to do that unless you are ordered. If you had no like that I'll tell mamma."

"I am s ray if my books d n't ple .- a you."

"I shall hit think they would place any body," she will, with a sneer.

"They do though," I retorted, pertly.

and his the rely expected a lamination of my apparation.

"Leave this room!" she exclaimed, fariously. "If you come here again to-day I'd box your cars."

I retired triumphant and exulting, as any other girl of my age would have done, in my victory.

Mrs. Amory waited anxiously for the time to return to the city; she was weary of the country; its repose b rel her; and I used to look at her in undisquised astonishment, as she exclaimed against the duliness of every thing and every bely around; I would have asked no greater happiness than never to have left that beautiful place which she valued only as one ducing to her position and importance.

I had, even at that age, a keen perception of the borneral strong artistic and postic tastes, which, if rightly devel polywould be to me a source of great benefit. Miss Western sow all that, and, unlike many others in her position, sho was willing to bend her whole powers to the task of devel ping my faculties.

Her father had been an artist of no mean reputation; sho inherited much of his talent, and had received from him the rough and honest principles in regard to art, which she made the basis of her teachings.

But I will linger no longer over these unimportant port is in my history; I only wish to seize and present the features, though it was necessary that I should dwell somewhat up in this season.

CHAPTER VI.

LOUISE AND I.

WE were settled in New York.

I was now thirteen, and Louise over fourteen; but in apparance I was her elder, as in all mental acquirements and natural talents I was her superior.

She had a slight, willowy figure, such as American girls often possess, very graceful and elerant, but Jacking strength and vigor, and her movements were always languid and indicate. She had light, almost flaxen hair, delicate and finely cut it stures, but lacking character, and when she was not animated they had a prevish expression which detracted from their loveliness.

Assilt myself, I do not know if I was handsome—I think not. I was tall and shader, my step springy and clastic; the crims in of health mantled in my cheeks, and I certainly had had in millant eyes and hair; my mouth was never good—it extremel too much resolution, even self-will, to be agreeable in its expression.

We were as unlike in character as in personal appearance; in fact, Louise had very little, while I was only too independent and solf-reliant. She was willful, irritable and false. She really had not sufficient energy to be very active even in her aversions, else I should have suffered much more than I did from her tyranny and dislike.

The first skill discovers were provided for her, but shows he had a few showy to the little beautifully—played well, and simplified as were opened y do that he ked expression as much as her first. She had no taste for books; even novels did not little her, and si they were the most vapid and unusuaning records of fashionable life.

As for me, the love of books was one of the strongest passions—I can use no other werl—in my whole antere. Miss Weston's watchfulness prevented my realing works that would have irretrievably injured my with he I can be the sufficiently grateful to her for that and all the other has in the which she bestowed upon me during her reliables in the family.

The house was constantly fill I with a majory of r Mrs. Amory was one of the queens of the fishing the with Sill young, she had lost nothing of the beauty to will be to a her earliest girlhood, she had been cellicated, and her many power of a ficcination which I mayer saw equal long of by one other—that was her neph w, East a Amore.

In appearance, the two recombled on hother, and there must have been many similar points in their characters—the same unyielding will, strong parties; all hill a under the charm of that delightful manner, but gaining new face from their very concealment.

I was always in Mrs. Amory's hord in of a morning; it pleas I har that I should sit there drown in a mowhat functiful costame, engaged with her notting sills, while six received her guests.

People used to stare at not a great dad, and printing ingular beauty—that always care of her. Mrs. Amorphysis.

ficiently kind to me—it was her way. So to obtain just as she might have done a pet animal—restrict in in the same light that she did the creations promise in the light that she did the creations in the light that she did the creation in the light that she can be a light that she can be a light that the creation in the light that she can be a light that the creation in the light that the creation is the light that the creation in the light that the creation is the light that the light that the creation is the light that the light th

When she found that I protected and any protected about of making in a real for the protected have I been called out of the father of the fath

A love of a balancian was a great with the late of a strong and presidents as it was, and I, disaps excited a could not consult how superhum may grant and be will I considered her. I verily believe that my innocunty outered flatteries made her more kindly disposed toward me than she would otherwise have been. Very often, when dre-sed to go out, she would make some exerts for summoning me to her presence, that she might please herself with my artless admiration.

"A really poetic and artistic taste this child possesses," she sail to Miss Western, as if in apology for her own weakness; "she certainly has a remarkable eye for color. After a while I must have her design all my contumes—I can judge of their effect so nicely."

A fine use, truly, to have devoted any artistic power I possested, most assuredly; but it never would have occurred to Mrs. Amory that it could have been better employed than in gratifying her caprices, and I would gladly have done that, or any thing else, to have given her pleasure, for I was very, very grateful to her.

So the winter passed-flew I should say-for verily it had wings!

My life went on smoothly enough, but Louise fretted and rebelled. She longed to be out in the world—the amusem ats and pursuits proper for her age afforded her no satisfaction. She was in the drawing-rooms a great deal—always exquisitely dressed, and of course greatly petted and a haired by her mother's guests.

I think Mik. Amory periodly wor hip, I her. She was the only person, except Bet n, whose will had any inducate over her. I can not finey Louise capable of having felt affection for any one but herself. She was often important and ungrateful to her in ther. I never heard her speak earelesly, or even look disent to a wish, that I did not murvel how it was possible when her own, own parent had de irel it. Louise would doubtle a have harded at my fineles had I express them; there was no such sentiment as reverence in her nature, and, in hel, her mather had so for Mal and launcred her, that it was to be expected she would have grown as a lich and ungovernable as she proved here it in every act of her life.

I can not write much about that season; no one event simils out in sufficiently prominent relief to make its record interesting.

I did not see Easten Amory, although he was several times expected in town; but, upon each recasion, he sent some excuse instead of coming him if.

He was at collect, I kn w, and so wis Whiter Struct; although, of course, I never heard the name of the latter mantioned. Once I astonished Miss Western quite out of her proprieties, and almost out of her sines, by along by making him a topic of conversation as we sat in the sch. From one evening while Louise was given to some fancy bull, given for young persons of her age.

"Dos Walter Stuart never visit his aunt?" I askel, boiling up from the drawing up a which I was english.

Miss Western's book drepped from her hand, and she sat regarding me with an expression of how r and considerant which convulsed me with internal larger.

"What did you say?" she exclaimed.

I very coolly repeated the question, while she start I at me more wonderingly than before.

"Is there any thing so remainable in it?" I call, at length, somewhat vexed by her manner. "I am sare it is a very natural question to a k, as I never see him here, and know him to be her nephew."

"Miss Madge Wylde," return 1 the pw raise, I will back in her chair, and recovering her wits and he ath, " will you have the goodness to tell me where you relied that init remaining?"

"From hims li, to be sure," I really and the commotion I had excited.

"Are you a witch?" asked the a verm a laying down her book; "you certainly appear to learn every thing by intuition."

"I don't know how that may he—Bas n chat that I was one; but this merning Miss Late in that that that she thought it was my mather who had analy I that honor."

Mics Western smills a little les was to project thing father, but in spire of her best and being the first and being significations of the project and significant other projects to be a second and se

"How do you happen to know Mr. Stant! " she in and;

"tell me at once."

"I have no wish to make a secret of it. I met him in the park at Woodbrook-he was after his dog, and we had a larg talk. I saw him several times, and I like him very well, although not so well as Easton."

"My dear child," returned that kind friend, "Mrs. Amory would be very angry if she knew of this; it must never occur a ; in."

"It was not my fault, Miss West in; besides, how was I to

"I am not blaming yea, only giving you advice as to the future."

"Why does she di like him?" I aske l.

"Circumstances have a parated the two families forever, and Mrs. Amory allows no communication between her house. Ladd and that of Mrs. Staart. You must respect that communication at once."

"What parted them?" I dement h, sharply. "I have always wondered what the reason could have be m."

"I can not enter into d tails; in loci, I am not the resulty as related with the m, and if I were, it would not be proper to relate them to any one. But remember what I have a My yould I shall not mention this conversation to Mrs. Amany, therein I shall following their to inform her if I know of your soler Mr. Struct a cain."

"Very well, maken, I will remain r," was my answer, and there the mutter dropped. I remain to my half for ished drawing, and Mis Western arein took up her book.

But while I worked, my brains were puzzling them lives, as they had so often done, for a solution to the mystery, the ight with no more sures than usual; and but we had Mas William southant of the last to be had been out the white my leisure.

As, about that time, I had taken to composing your sand stries, I two n a pain that was in my had, and the won-derial nystery, it was borg below I tell and p.

CHAPTER VII.

WALTER STUART.

Spring came again. I had been a year in my new home. Replete with interest and improvement had that your land me. Who, to have seen me then, well clay, as much alvanced in my studies as met girls of my age, wall have recognized me as the street-sweet ref Br. lway!

Mrs. Amory's amiable dan liter conditions I me of my former existence -drawing its r v bling than ries into the pleasantness of my new life; but clierwie, there was nothing to recall the darking of that so, on.

To my extreme delight, we returned to W. Ur It in the latter part of May. When the carier relief a relief the brief avenue, I fairly chapped my honds and men a more innertion of pleasure. Louis curled her lip, hat Mrs Att. rv looked at me with good-hun, rel cate my -sly Med with exhibitions—they were tributes to her minds and medical I mentally determined that she should mover a him with a similar one.

We had only been a few weeks at W in it what a urgent summons called Mrs. An. ry both to the Line L. accompanied her. I knew there was a residence in with their afficies, for I bourt Mrs. At the year !! wise that they were to med De a in the cap.

That latter fiet account limited particular in the journey too! How I have to protect I think Louise funcial that will be the transfer I was I it behind.

When the carriage diappear 1 is as view, I leave I into the week, and, thering my little to the first may to a paion of term. Bull. let his his his his accompany them home, so I am at 1 the return to an at Patience I could, but were a real to collaborate in the ment. At the expiration of a week, Mrs. Amory and Louise Came, but Eliston was not with them. Mrs. Amory looked tirol and treabled—something had evidently gone wreng with her, for she appeared quite unlike hers it.

A few days after, however, her banker came up to Woodbrook, and was closeted with her for several hours. After that interview, she recovered her spirits and customary manner. The only clue I had to the matter was when Miss Louise danced into my room the next morning, exhibiting a goodly supply of gold and bank notes.

"Look here," she said. "I am going to visit the Living-ston girls very soon, and this is to spend as I think proper. Mamma has been mistrably cross for a week past—the id-a, rich as she is, of being placued about money! But I know that she and Easton both were, for their affairs are all united, and they quarreled horribly. Heigh-ho!" she continued, throwing herself upon my bod, and thinging the pillows at my favorite cat, "when I marry my cousin, I will set all these trifles right."

She marry Easton! I stooped, under pretense of carcing my por kitten, but in reality to concerl my face, where a mingling of passion and grief were struckling for mastery.

I made no reply, nor did Louise v. lanteer any further inf rmation concerning either matter.

Louise went to make her visit, and Mrs. Amory accompanied her, fall of life, and as magnificently beautiful as ever. I was left behind that time also—Louise was fearful that I might delire and enjoy the visit. Her delusion was a great relief to me. There was nothing I so much dreaded as being forced away from that beautiful spot to the homes of the insolent and great.

. The summer preced much as the other had done. I saw Walter Stuart once, but it was no feelt of mine. I did not inform Miss Western of this fact.

I had gone down to the river, and satisfy upon the shore, listening to the ripple of the waters, and watching the white sails as they flated slowly past like great birds drifting down the current. I was humaning, in a rich but uncultivated voice, a sang that I had cought from Louize, when I was started by having another voice take up the refrain, and, raising my eyes, I saw Walter Stuart standing to fore mo.

"I am so glad to see you," he will, he diling out his hund with his beautiful, frank smile. "Ill. ve len ler a ve le and, as I leave to-morrow, I was all all I all litter to go without catching a single climps of you."

I quite forgot Mis Western's problème a intimple de l' seeing him, though I must comiss to having our rise is an instant's disappointment, for when I here I there is a the sight that it might be Easton had thehel a.r - n.v mild.

"You have grown very much," he sail. "You will a n be a young lady, Madge-what then?"

"What then?" I repeated. "I dank know what you mean."

"What are you going to do-what are you ging to be?" "Do-be!" I murmured.

The words struck a chill to my hart; they had never before occurred to me. Now, I was how here I by the saledenness with which they fored themselves up a my mind.

"Don't look so troubled," Swart sail, kindly; "parkings it was not wise in me to rouse to h thoughts in that little had at present—we will forget them."

"No, no!" I interrupted, early. "I. the think-lit has think! You can not tell how trangly the wrise it. to me."

"But I can," he answered, with a sert of imperior, "if r I have pondered them long and deply in my mind. I live. wire, Madre, have to be and to do! I am ali.. t a man ali... and my decision must soon by male."

"But rich people do nethin " I said. "Mr. At. July works, nor Louis, nor Easten."

Stuart stamped restlessly upon a mon line line of a men the sand.

"Why did you speak of them, Male," he was 1; " !. not make me feel bitter and bal harted to-lay. I was not rich. The hour that sees me of age will have me at and my poor mother also."

"But you have a great house."

"On my twenty-third birth day we barr it fary a tree is a home where we can be talk on I all wiff I of N. M. I. but richer, neverthele s, then my problem in the I have unsullied conscience, and the large of a mother who is the an angel."

"Haston is not preval," I said, with a rising of my old imprince, "if you mean him-had is kind and cool,"

Walter Sourt charled his hards with Sallen parion; his eyes their land his hips compressed; but the sterm vanished as speedily as it had threatened.

The last time I saw you, Malge," he said, "I pranjed that when you were of her I would tell you a true story—the time has not yet come, but it soon will! In the mean while, do not let us talk of Easton Amory."

"I must not talk to you at all," I said, suddenly recollect-ing my governess' commands.

"What do you mean?"

"I was forbillen to speak to you again. I had forgotten all about it in my surprise at seeing you."

My bonnet was off. Walter Stuart stooped, and with the self-imp movement of old, stroked my hair, which was braided smoothly back from my face, repeating—

"Poor Madge, poor little Madge!"

We did not speak again for several moments, and his face grew soft and mournful with thoughts which I could not understand.

"Why do you always call me poor Madge?" I asked.

"Does it offend you?"

a No, not that, but every body else is always telling me how fortunate I am, how happy I ought to be."

"And are you?"

- "Yes, almost always very Lappy. Are you happy, Walter Stuart?".
- "Oh, never min l, Madre; that is a difficult question for any human being to answer."

"I don't see why-"

"You are very young yet, Midge—young, and so innocent. Gold keep you always the same, little one! But let us say good-by now. When we meet again, each will be obler—perhaps wiser."

"Siall you not come soon to visit your mother?"

a She will not be here—she goes with me. She would never have come nor the place but for her premise."

"What promise?"

"No mater new. As I said, I shall have a stry for you hereafter-time only can tell whether it will interest $ a."

"Now you puzzle me aren," I wil: "I can not tell by all what you mean, Walter Stuart."

I suppose, will ten have that, as it must many a thing that I would gladly keep from your leaders by I have the resulting the large. Madge, you will not forget me."

"In leet, I will not. I am a my per are so Li top. G. 1.

by, Walter."

"Good-by, little Malro-g dely."

He looked as if there were son thing he wish I there, but would not, gazing into may eyes as if tryle it is it in very soul, while his lips moved involutionly with the line that he did not utter.

Subbody, he turned so as to have a view of the tell chine-news and pointed roces of We first, that is so that is like a through the trees, and a great charp pass to relate a first. He litted a hard, stern for at, and walled proving a sufficient pass to that old house were suffered by remarking to the little pass to the world exhibit neither four nor pain; but his last to the last war so one of kindness. The last war is I have believe to the content.

"Poor Malge-pour little Malge!"

CHAPTER VIII.

THE SECOND MEETING.

I not be n two years in that house before I ardin saw II ar a Amary. I was almost fifteen then, so much cleared from the rear I child be had son in Broadway, that it would have been deficult for any one to have recognized me as the same.

We were at Woo brook; his aunt had been expeding him for several weeks, but he so often disappointed her when she looked for his coming, and I myself had so many times welt till I was quite ill with the grief of not seeing him, that I had not, on that eccasion, allowed myself to expect him so captly—at least, I thought such was the case; probably if he had full I to arrive, I should have shed as many that as helder, although I considered exhibitions very the light, out of the will have which I ledi vol myself to have attain the lim and his relatives; saw how tall, monly, and provide he had grown; and when they all entered Mrs. Amory's sixting and to convers unitestrainely, I hurried out of the house, we plot I all by ever my low lines.

He came at last.

And all the alternative by the property of the

At 1. 1 delet 1. y bars, and watchest into the first of the control of the contro

While I stool there, East a Am ryre and was the steps of the terrace, smoking his citar. My first it and a true to hide myself; much as I had I ag I to see him. I take a sellen fear for which I could not account.

He walked I is rely into the garden, and applically did not recognize me until he had approached quit not to the place where I stood. He looked at no elempty, then the expression changed to one of astenishment, while I remained to make the make a unable either to speak or run away.

"Is it possible that you are Main?" he on him. 1.

I could only book up with a said a bust of this; my heart was so full of mingled emotions that they call our rest themselves in no other way.

He hurried to me and sho k my hand e july, talking rapidly all the while.

"Why, you little signy, you have grawn into the a picture! How tell you are! and Phillip! what qualitative that hair! Can't you qualit, you will be Main? Arm't you all all glad to see me?"

"Well, don't cry then; that is a strate way to show your joy," and his merry laugh on the hand a little to retrain my feelings.

"I know it is very follow," I sail; "but I allow help erying-I thought of so many things."

"Of what, you silly puss?"

"All your goodness to me-how you to he had a y had that dreadful place, and—"

"There, there, den't think of it!" he all, purious large kindly.

"I can't help it; I man, you know."

"But I do not like it! After all, it is I who have to be grateful; you know you savel my lil."

I dried my eyes at that provid, each teat the provide act of my life which made merch has been been as a second of the case.

"How your eyes shim, Male! Why, with a life of you have grown!"

Then I has hell quite gray, for my with the and and and coaly excited by kindness as they were depressed by a cold look,

"And how do you get on?" he asked.

"So well," I answered. "Miss Western says I learn very fast-and 'ch, Easten, she has taught me to draw. I work and study as hard as I can."

"That is right; and so you are to be a painter?"

"No, no, I am not such a haby as that. But don't you remember it was you said I had so much talent for drawing? You saw my little sketches-"

" Perhaps so," he said, doubtfally.

"Oh, have you forgotten that?" I exclaimed, with a pang of disappointment.

"No, no, of course not; I only wanted to vex you a little.

I remember it very well."

"I am glad you did not forget-very glad."

"You must show me some specimens of your work. does my aunt say to them?"

"I never showed her any-she would not care for them, you know; she ses so many real pictures."

"And Louise?"

"Oh, she never likes any thing I do. I always put my drawings out of sitt when I har her coming."

"Intellition I supposed is as amin't as ever?"

I did not answer. I was an how rather with and would not stalk ill of my but drawn of deviater, with make quite oller gittere chally her shall we explore the meaning, want of truth and talent.

"You don't my any thing," pur ! I D. n; "well, I per-feetly understand without."

"> " I Ty to the term of I make the term of term o -y - him her har; "only the other day I head her William I Man and I to ber to the "

"Mary the the training the sell in the sell with a sell of the "I am review I can her hand the campling the

In my less I have believe be did not blue ber, and yet I li. it.r; it - . I a taribe this to be est of favor with could have heard his words.

"How long since you have been here?" I salk my thoughts going back to the time that had chaped since I flat saw him. It seemed like booking down up has to relie to review the existence which I had left so far boking.

" Have you wanted to see me alor?" he will L

"Very much; surely, Eliston, you can not think my so ungrateful."

"Now don't use that word," he interrupt.", while the cities quick changes of humor; "I have it were than capeth r in the English harmone. If I had to fall state it it to any our, I should want to tear his heart out, and I don't what yet to hate me, Madge."

"There is not much danger."

"I think not," he will, with his production in I think not."

"Shall you stay all summer have?" I la lie 1.

"That depends—I do not haw how how," he replied, absently, then a bled, "No, not the whole sometimes in Figure 1. Sometimes have a several weeks, if I find in place 1. Sometimes have a my gip y print sell

"Ishall be bhappy!" I eachim hair my all print-ate abruptness.

"But Louise will terment your life and if I am I at you," he said, with a laugh.

"I shall not mind her; if you speak pleasally sin con not do any thing to annoy me."

He cave me a quick, so rellag lock.

"How old are you, Malga?" he a hel.

"I shall soon be fifteen," I replied.

Tou look full that," he asswered; " and you are very handsome, Mulge-has any one tally a refer

"No; I thought Louise was had in ; I had this I I could be with this brown face."

"Why, you are as lewisching as egly a france can be returned; "that brilliant shin and all he can be returned; "that brilliant shin and all he can be returned; but he has Louise's haby to a; but he is haby to a; but he is haby to a; but he can be good as a large that he had all he are good as a large that he had all he are sight."

At that men at Leties spin at his time to terree, and looked around as if care in the

"She wants you," I whispered.

"Dence take her! I hope she will not see me! Is there no place to hide?"

But, as he spoke, Louize's cyes fell upon the spot where we were standing.

"Madge!" she called, sharply; "Madge!"

"What do you want of her?" asked Elaston, before I could speak.

"I want her to come into the house," she replied.

a volume of smoke.

"Malze!" exclaimed Louise, fairly stamping her foot, "if you don't come here this moment, I'll go and tell mamma!"

" I am coming," I answered, and moved forward.

"Den't go," whispered Easton; what do you care for her mother. I will see that you get into no trouble."

"Please let me go," I said, pleadingly; "I ought to obey, you know."

"Not for long," I heard him mutter; "not for long."

He looked at me eagerly, and with an expression which I did not comprehend.

"Malge Wylle!" callel Louis, "I ask you once mere if you are coming ?"

"Yes-yes," I said, hurrying on.

"There is no Each creat laste," Easten said, following me. When we reached the fact of the terrace, he added, "Well, Lexic, is the east of the world at hand? You called cut as if a thing of he importance could be the matter."

"I wanted Malie," returned Leuie, angrily; "she is nover at hand when she is needed."

"What do you wish?" I asked.

That quak until you are teld?" she exclaimed; "you grow nore importment every day."

I chiral violently, and Esten bushed in a way that aggravated her anger.

"What is wreng new?" he ask I. "Dar me, Lexie, day't his pair lips —it is sail to be a sim of ill-t up or."

"Go up tule, Make I who exclaimed, evidently amoyed that I should be a with a to Haston's raillery.

"Oh, none her," return I he; "let her stry here."

"She is to go into the home. I say! and another time, miss, den't let me exteh you in the purith he is in him in the property whatever there."

"Oh ho, that is the head cirl to lit of her all talling is it?" said Easton; "oh, poor Louise!"

She was realy to cry with pasin, and I said:

"Mrs. Amory gave me bave to gothers where I like L"

She darted a farious 1 th at ma, and which her arm struck a vase, placed upon the help trade; it had not been properly set in its place, and it to red-markedly glicely upon her head, when I dart her head, place is from her head, when I dart her report, publisher aside, and received the blow upon markets.

aught me, or I should have till n.

"Run for some water, Louist!" he call 1; " I have a has fainted!"

I shook my head to show that I was not incomible, but felt too sick and weak to open my open.

"Can't you stir, Louis ?" here; to l.

"I feel very faint," she sail; "I am so fit the at l."

"You are a fiel," I heard him marter.

He helped one to a seat and I of his hypers. He ran into the house and brought a glass of water, which he is me to drink.

"Are you better?" he ask I, anxi--ir.

"Much; I am not hurt I think."

Louise was just preparited for the Lympia contact by with her upon every possible of the long with Min. And my min.

"What is the matter?" size that. "Line, invitation, are you hurt?"

"Not in the least," replied Harm; "shame to her heal, but Make har heal, but Make heal harm."

The child's arm must be broken."

It pained me excesively new, and we discipling swellen. Mrs. Amery can be well in the little

"It is only sprained," she wild; "Main, paralled and thank her."

"For what? I think if you will be if I have stock and faint as possible."

"Haston, please assist your cousin," sail Mrs. Amery, "while I take Madge to the hou cheeper and have her arm bathed."

"She is too weak to walk," he sail.

I saw Mrs. Amory's angry look.

"I can walk," I said; "indeed, I am not much hunt."

"You are a very coura roots child," she berm, warmly, but checked herself at Louise's movement of an er; she was evidently divided between her feeling of kindness toward me and her fear of some outburst upon her daughter's part.

"Come," she said, "you must have something put on your arm, Madge."

Easton followed me.

a moment." said his aunt; "I will return in "Exense me," he replied; "I have some feelings of humanity. I choose to know if she is injured."

"I wish she had been killed I" exclaime I Louise. Springing from her seat, she swept into the hall, and up the stairs.

"Leuise is so nervous," said Mrs. Amory; "she will be obliced to Madge when she has time to think the matter over."

"Do you think so?" he askel, colly.

"Come, Madge," she said, impatibally; "come with me." She took me to the har keep r, and my arm was drawn.

"You had have a cup of tea." Mrs. Am ry sail; "I will see that you have a cup of tea."

"Oh, let her sit up," Il. ten ur !.

She made me a sim which I under to be and I went at one; up to the calcelram, where Mis We term could be with me upon my accident, and I chall with me in a man imprience.

"You prings savel Miss Lands Will," said the port man

"She mil she with I I had be nothed," I replied.

Mis We'ra excluded linear liberally:

" Why, M. ! "

position as hers."

talk in that way. Is your man better?"

"A little; but it aches badly yet."

"You and I will have a cup of to," she said: "then you shall lie down on the soft, and I will real to you."

"You are very good," I auswer i, the term ridge to my eyes, but my pride gave me strength to keep them be in

It was a long time before my arm get well; I do not think Louise ever forgave me for the service I real reil. r.

I suffered a great deal during that vide of H. This - 1 - 1 - 1 son to which I had looked forward with - mich and ty. But I soldom saw him; when I did, it was but I full with a same and he would have only time to give mental her a world.

When the day came for him to diplat, I was let main I to bid him good-by; I was too young to think the rows any impropriety in the act. I took my way through the park to the lodge-gates, and waited there until the carriers drive down.

He looked out and saw me, ordered the driver to stip, and sprung from his seat.

"There you are!" he exclaimed "I hant I the home over to find you, and came to the early in that I have have shut you up."

I shook my head and smiled flintly the weather to an

"Did you come here to bil me gally, giry?"

"Yes," I replied; "I could not bet you go with ut some you."

"You are a little angel," he sail, hising my firthed."
"By the time I see you arein, you will be grown a pour; laly." He bent nearer and whispered, "Mind you I want as well then as now?"

For the first time some un kalmal thought made my hart beat rapidly.

"Good-by now, Make," he said, his ing managin; "god-by, you black-eyed beauty."

"When will you come again?" I ask !.

"I shall see you this winter," he answer I: " retainer, it will be only you that I shall care a straw to reason."

He hade me forewell once more, spring into the marine, and was driven rapidly away. I start which the public from view, then I want may take dry, and walks I showly toward the hade.

I m t L in the avenue, and she demanded, with her usual imperiousness:

"Where have you been, Madje Wylde?"

"I went to lil Easten God-by," I replied, boldly.

"You are an insolent, good-for-nothing little wretch!" she excluimed, raising her hand as if to strike me.

"That is the arm the vase fell on," I replied, quietly; "you can hurt it if you wish."

She dropped her hand, and walked away without a word. Perhaps even her dull nature felt a little shame at her own harshness and cruelty.

CHAPTER IX:

A MAIDEN DREAM.

I DID not see Elston Amory until about two years after that time—two leng, long years—for he did not keep his prince; some quarrel with his aunt separated them for a season.

I was slitting at ne in Mrs. Amory's drawing-room one members, bustly occupied with my no flework, when I heard for your in the hall, a thressing a servant:

"Tell Miss Louise that her cousin, Mr. Amory, is in the

II' r .rv.

My hort gave one bound and then stood still; the musline's political my first special and risid, as if the way is in the ast rund not to stone. I can but the reduction of my form a mirror opposite—my checks were very puls, and my eyes rolless and anxious as those of a will ariund the large to trade from its imprisonment.

I be at Levis december the stairs with her until listless step; I saw the flat roof her silken garments through the half passion and en in which the citerra I in my mint.

I'm the first time I compact a belong own follows - I was and my heart thrill- l to its new sometimes like an arrangillis bursting suddenly into bloom.

I know that I lovel East a Andry with all the initially of a strong nature, all the forcer of a will. And it will be a less as that of a tirer in an East range also.

If he loyed me I did not then think; I a did thy lie a to the voice some ling in my heart, I all and all and the trial and the music, rousing a hot of beautiful visites that a present it is a second to the present the pres up like a troop of gold nember des at France is call.

How I got through that day I can a 1 'll. I result that when Mrs. Amory entered the apartment, he result is at there so white and silent, that even silent is I real asked me if I were ill. She had a head high a lap work as go out to walk, giving me several shall consider to execute.

I dress I myself and went forth into the edd, wintry in that blow refreshingly up as may for health and refreshingly up as may for health yell the strong the and little. I walked for down Brown Brown yell that crossing where I held I may be for me to apply the elements of anxious to feel that I was really any line.

It was quite dark when I nature had be I with prints, Louis opened the door of her chanter as I called the land.

"How do I look?" she demant hat any being

I could continuity sive an answer that plant in the I had never seen her appear so having.

She was nearly cirliten now, and had, that some introduced into society, although somethic with the first large mother's wishes, for her health was not all had been persuasions, fretalness, and obtained in to have her own way, provided a large field judgment.

She was already a great tella awiter to her heavy his now, gring out every night to a second tell to a least to a second tellar and already a least to a least to a least to a least to a least tellar and a least to a least tellar and a least

Her mail had just fluid a demine her, and so it leafner me that and smilling, with a current and a large own charms.

Her dress of India madia, started and spotted with gold, was extremely becoming to her delicate complexion, and the Pearls twin lamong her light ringlets all let the effect.

"We are ging to the opera, and from there to Mrs. Allien's bill," she sail, in explanation of her early toil t. "Hat m is lare, so we shall be very gay i'r some time."

I let the room as quickly as I sille, although she had various tridling duties for me to perform before she would release me.

I have sell in filts occided as an illustration. There was efter in my vein, l'hiller my egt, ciin. hint my chette, Liebbaring matter with the meaning and Mind We term has la dini la tilis la la per le reste e vere ne la r rquir 1; so I had not a shaden him les when I call o french creating Per, derell grant We her rate and rate dependence in Harps, but I am alaba know that she married well, on him a he . - of her out i and lapin som has emperated the trial of her caller l., ,

I was allow with my will the in the I I per I up do ! then the last well my for a coly our hour, without even stopping to lay aside my bonnet.

I hard the der of Lamista character open at hat, and Shrink into my changer to avail to the her. I want that the closer was over; bout I have a telephone to It is the formation of the property of the last of the state, I . it in the hall and more.

Illinith at heat he that he was a less did not hear it, the agh Louis langh many up to the landing where I stool, tes the y per lather the half half have on their way to the C.TT.

There was a mit before my cycle that I could disting the to the compact of the party to the contract of in that I was mit a blind, and become I required them I

I to the later than t a party. I bear he was been been been to be and they place, The second secon I state the same of the same in the same in the same in the same of the same of the same in the same of the same o white-areat at a track the Area. I looked in the mirror, and have the I was invalid: Never had the condition which has a second up a treas that I was gladened to make any falling of partial law adjusting force, exhibit give, for which I had no nature.

I went down to the charles in winger in. Where the sub-last light of the charle liers but new rightness to the surrounding objects, and then myself a right of the charles are

I must have noted there is a loss-top end and their passed away, having me in a case t, it is so in an addition had no power to be it. A claim in the large run in the street ten—at the same man, at I had a log to in in the street down—it eponed—the rews a step in the hall to tall to tall happened as hept time—the driving run in a runs the pair, and Easton Amory entered.

The immers appropriate war divided by an arthural partial by markle piller, help in the size of the support of the factorial of two in the size of the factorial contains. I was in the size of the factor of the fa

Howks somewhat characteristic to particular to the askert, block most in the history of History of the single if home to community to his the trust of the trust and a fail that was of rious, about divise.

He did not see me-he turn it to go est. I til not speak-my sen is some it de sting me-H constant quality to he had been a vain effort to problem its home. The his home, and it is to constant as a

When I came to myoff I was charactering to II and Amony's home; his heart the Wall that I had a property to II and his aware hot upon my firsh at any lip—their tree full arrecalled me to life.

I by very still, by breath combining in quick of a many of an angel.

"Laid up," he while the limit when the main's Inever been a paid than I which the half the large term is a yver. "Special to he, my half the last term is a p-

Herrich buy best to be the depth of my a deal to be

I could not stir-there was something in his shade which had a merhetic inthe nee over me, and left me powerles in his embrace as a charmed bird.

"Have yet white lir me?" he akel; "have yet with !

IN THE CHARLES

A in his We pre al mine-it seemel as if that car s unleaked my tengue. I did not attempt to free my. If; I Was too harry, him there; but I answered early:

"Whit I! I that he I should never see you again—never!

Why did you not come being?"

"I could not Make; it was ing . The! Do not than mer; I, too, have har eland pined for this meting. I here t to a you this morning, but could not and; so I stale away Ir in that tire in party, and hurried here without any one's linewing it, est in that I should find my darling. Say, are Fou happy now?"

"So happy, oh, so happy!"

I we do carry the fruth-and in the inn there of my sal the property that which could make me i ar to achieveledge it.

For any time I could not talk much; but at he change the ball of the contract of th in paint as I was had a feling that I should not be ditting thus alone with any one.

We walked dayly up and day the orat real II. maist—and conversed of many this — every this plant had be present to the decide of the land in a difficulty in the particular to express.

"Arthy hind "yet" Dains athelet beeth.

"Y "I . II. "Mrs. Am ry is very hind; as I r I. ..., I she dare to treat you badly?"

West to the first to the first

" He had the head to be the head of the he Elicie," retrieved Desirably, believed by it is the first the contract of the

- 1-

He added something in a lower tene, which I did not understand.

That was a bless I evening to me, at heath my brain was in such a which that I could not take half its heppines. I was like a sick man who has a couling draught offered him, and spills it in his cagernes to solve the retrailing beverage!

Easten asked to see that of thy printings; and I I delim to one that Mrs. Appry had placed in the public only a few days before—I harned, afterward, as the world of Lorie.

It was a fruit sens—the cripical distillable a taken at Woodbrook, and it was the metallible effort I had attempted.

"Did you do that?" he will.

"Certainly-why not?"

"Only to-day Louise tall me they he glat it at a sale-

"Oh, it is no matter," I said. Ind. d. It said I'm' very little consequence to me then.

"You have done wealtry" he remail; "who trivial you?"

"Miss Western, while she shall; sing then I have were I have been been while they were doing by picture."

"You will be a great woman yet," he said, hardingly,

"Do you think the day near at hand?" I wit hand in turn at his jest.

"She is anxious for it," he continued: "the many the whole world at her flet, to be perchanded in a light way body."

"No, no," I replied quidity; I can be to the

I hate unfinished sentences."

" if a year approve," I milled: and the please him.

At the time ment a carrier and the particular and and the particular that have a first the particular terms.

"My tent!" will have you are reall."

He cla ped me again in a passionate embrace, and then crossed the pathers, threw open one of the windows, stepped into the lulcony, and haped lightly down.

"Good-night, Juliet!" I heard him whi-per, as he ran along the garden path.

I went up stairs, and was in my chamber before the sleepy servant had opened the dear to them. I had taken off my dress and put on a plainer one, when Mrs. Amory's maid came to my chamber—her mistress desired me to come at once and read to her.

Mrs. Amory was thoroughly out of humor. I knew very well the cause—it was owing to Easton's having decreed them so unceremoniously at the opera, and not appearing at the tall during the whole evening. I amused myself with inholming what her fichings would have been could she have known that he had spent the intervening hours with me.

I had to real to her for a long time; but she fell asleep at last, and I stoke away to my chamber, to reflect upon my own exceeding happiness.

The dawn strugged up into the sky, and found me still siving there— he ming-draming!

I did not so Easton the next day, although he called; but I hourd his sip, his vice—it was a mothing! During the fill sing weeks he was there daily, although he no longer made his home at the house.

Mr. Amery , we a grant I dl—the last of the scalon—for Lent was near at hand. I sat in my chamber listening to the har least it it at 1 up on the perkindel air, minuted with the treat of the denotes, and the gay hurster of the years and the while at 1 it is no wish to join them; I filt no bits rue seem than at 1 ling shot out from such pleasure, as if I lile a a continue of another model from the educity, the last of like at an element of the period of in the interest of a like at an element of its left in the continue of a like a like

They who have always had him I film is to levich affording upon them, understand little the intensity with which a lonely, passion decreature, such as I was, said at any glimpse of love off rol. I had not in the ight had to I had not in I loved—into whose eyes I had he inch until the rot of the world had passed from my sight, so that wherever I turned I could see only his image.

The next day I was sating with Mrs. Amory in her drawing-room, trying to annual her with a merch when Raston entered the apartment.

I must have grown very pile, but Mrs. Amory dil not observe it, and he grown has kindly en mah, but as it I had be not child. I was diplosed, not, around. I i it thet, held I have in his place, I should not have had to make his later him—by he had a even an instant. Dut I did not there him—bh no, I could not have done that.

I be a to tak with him, but that was input like and there I sat in all new over some with I had taken up, while he conversed sayly with his ment and emin, a see the ling me any mere than if I half a a side rase.

I let the room and went to my country, but I could not be quiet while I has with the weath the limit down stairs into the library, and while I stail that I have been covered the room, giving me the wall in that my heart covered.

"Be happy," he whisp red; "provide and this summer."

There was no time to add any thing index. He left the hour, but I returned to my dates quit and at ease.

"Malgal" called Lanisa is I employed to income a, "pick the section in , I can't?" A the state of the Mala, of embroiding with a two lands as a spice of the Mala, where is my smaller in the I am a to perfect the I do Mala, which you would be my think as a section of the I am a section of the I am a section of the I am a perfect the I am a section of the I am a perfect the I am a section I should be a family of the II am a perfect the I am a section.

That was the mail style of the bestyle construction to me, but I never paid the least attention, so we got on after a fashion.

Spring-came at het, and we went to Woodbrook. Mrs. Amory was strangely quiet, and appeared much troubled. Once, during the journey, she began speaking of her addres, but Louise would not listen.

"Now den't bere me, mamma! Can't yest berrow n. ney if you haven't it? You must have, though."

Borrow!" returned Mrs. Amery, with a bitter haigh.

"How much do you supper I owe?"

of neither know nor care. We live at a farful expuss, to be sure; but one must live! Ask Easten to help you."

The young lady sunk back and complete life to stander, while her mother locked so anxious and wretched that I pitied her, but, of course, did not venture to speak; for, although size likely me, Mrs. Amony never, in the slightest degree, admitted me into her confliction.

CHAPTER X.

THE PROMISED HISTORY.

We had been at We brook nearly two wills who Easton Amory arrived. He had being this and publicant his aunt was fearful that he had been named.

He denied there having be a may thing the nature with him, and somed and yet at her soil him, whereat he is laughed in her irritating way. He are her has a fair tory looks—

" What do you mean?" he asked.

· "Oh nothing, of course."

"Such is frequently the cas," he remit it with a section affected her not at all.

"Young men noted for their steely helds are not to be illeate at a moment's warning," returned the

That this dark check the helphilip, but I had help room before he could give uttermed to the charge room I say I say

"You must excuse Louis," sall Mrs. Among: "sale is the from well; then, too, she has other cases in financial—I be not wonder much at it."

She gave Eat a a juli-rt at a level many being the meaning of which I did not at all competently; but it is uniformly indifferently:

"Oh, that is it, ch?—I with I had a late to a little land, and see the horses."

He flored a plan that had which I make a life or the country to be a like to the country with his decree to the country with

Mr. Andy was print to the with him in, and start a habit size hell when the hell he will be a let a le Perlangs even sile, ditant and proud as she was, felt glad of the spin thy which my face must have expressed if it was any index to my heart.

She threw here li upon a soft with a faint sirb, sweeping her hand acress her forchead as if trying to dispel the thoughts that troubled her.

"Ral to ma," she said; "this dull place will hill me! I ment have company in the house or I shall go mal." Then she muttered to herseld: "After next week every thing will be settled."

I did not understand what she meant-it was not until long afterward that the entire significance of her words was revended to me. Anxious as I was to go out, of course there was nothing for it but to sit patiently down and do as I was bidden.

I real to her for several hours, but I could no more have tall a sir in line in the book than if I had been puzzling over Sherit, Aftra time Easton looked into the room, and in his thus energed, came in to listen; but Mrs. Amory . n i un l'an exeus for dismis ing him, and sent him to Louisc. The next day, their man of business came up, and there was a long, stormy discussion in the library. I heard the " and of anyry voices as I pared through the hall—those of

Mrs. Amory and Easton in fierce recrimination.

I was fast asleep on her. 1 1; sa, estain that I should not be missed, I hurried off to Lay all beaut-the glan in the tarthest part of the woods-:, I led to a white to visit it since my return.

I was disamina, after my old fallion, under the treesr il . ing up n my own or at happin s, but never a king mysill was all to cal. Strang that the thought never carting in the smith and of a " lay contact I call not so the girm pathering in the 1.

I was now with the last several to be to be and the half while he is girl in pears, my beaut late the neutring of we man.

I is the total man the charity the well the brute. Les of the ment thee, my heart thirt in gheidly as the sanget a bird, without a thought beyond the brightness of my dream.

"Madge!" called a view I hatw very well, the arch it awoke no echors in my soul; "Milro!"

I turned my head without specking, and saw Walter Strart leaning on the wall, beckening me to approve

I had not seen him for a long, I my time, but he was much less altered than I. He was taller; his form had maked more breadth and force; but there was the same shap gloma upon his brown hair, the same kindly expression to his face.

I was very glad to see him, and, at his, summ as went quickly forward to greet him. We stood there for a long time, talking of every thing that connected or little past, when I remembered the revolutions he had all a promised to make, the thought of which had borg human land. There was so much I wished to know, and his stop might contain the information I desired.

When I made my request, he gazed at me for a little while in silence, and his factores changed as they always in the he looked full into my eyes.

"You are a woman now," las said, simily.

"Yes; and surely I may have the stay you promised to tell me, oh, so long ago."

"You have not forgutt n my wer la then F"

"Certainly not; I have then the opin of the myself to find their meaning."

"Who is at Woodbrook?" he asked.

"No one but the family, and—and—Mrs Americania."
I could not promotine the man—any que in it main bla, and I felt my cheeks grow hot.

"I understand," be said, in the said to the his war and quantity a numeric "I understand! I as that you are in little Madge, poor little Madge!"

The work cariel metals to erlet paris—to paris, the total lines to the first term of the lines to the first term of the lines to the lines to the deal my spirits then, we have a line of the solutions of the lines to the lines very qui la of competitions in. He shrouled his eyes for an in-tent with his hand, and when he removed it, a great light Lalgar on on this har-libakel gloomy as wat r when the : in has or. I to shine.

I funcial Walter Start unit:

"Come here," I said, "and sit down by me; I want to

I have that he for a where we were, or, in that mood, no plantion call have in healthin to enter these grounds; but at my billiar he sprung over the wall and scated him h by my side.

"Now the that stry," I urred. "I am so anxious to hear it."

"Very and I will; I want to ask you a few questions him Ar you happy? Answer me that."

" Very happy!"

The tree the expression of my feet, must have been their own evidence of my sincerity.

"And what have you been dair, all these years since we parted?" he questioned.

"Very little; nothing worth rejering, or that I could put in werls; my like has been always quit."

" So much the letter, so much the better."

- "And yes," I asked; "you are not still in collere ?"
- "thate; I are had a me than two years ago. Since that time I have be not week, Mudge, and the greater portion of it, very hard at work."

" Have you been long here?"

" We came yesterday, my mother and I-for the last time."

"For the last time?" I repeated.

"You, Malier; to me ment will be my twenty-third lirth dy-then we have this plant for ver."

"I can be turn be the land of your provide me as much as you did when I was a child."

"le is a sycony to understand, neverthele,"

"The a discontinued have my a rise-place clear up this City of James of the party of t "Il . . . I say a weed," but I turn b, "make me a pleasing,"

"III (in h p it-"

"Prince at to be at my with me lecture my story hap-Lasto by unlike that prot have beard trans thera's

"I have never heard any thing—you do not think Mrs. Amory would talk to me?"

"Very well-do not be off n! l."

"I never was angry with you," I replied; "cortainly I shall not begin now when we are parting for a long long time."

"Yes," he sail, "I suppose so it must be so! Oh Helio," he continued, with more ferver than I had ever heard also speak, "there is so much I would wish to say, but dare not speak, "there is so much I would wish to say, but dare not speak, would not like to listen! Well, well, thus will settle every thing!"

He broke off abruptly, and when he spike at in he had recovered the calmness which so because him, living so he idea of self-trust and repose that it lend me six notices in his presence.

"You have often asked me how I could be per and live in such a beautiful place—I will tell you. This was cur house until I became twenty-three. It might be mine it: like if I would submit to certain conditions—in I and I die first."

"What conditions?"

"Madge, years a jo, when Elect a Amery and I were very young—too young to have much reallection of the course of the time, and Louise only a cross below—we live it to the real Woodbrook, all alike dependent up at the captions of a cross peevish grandfather. The husbanks of my mether and Mr. Amory had been half brothers.

"His fortune was to be equally child a control has said, and he treated us all as if such was to the the C.

The estate was immens, and he had much ether property beside, so there was naturally a property of great would instore.

"My dear, kind mother all matheralities the last it is a property of the last with delily are the ell mais to a line of the last of the last the last to have all in the ness and attention, but sho is so made up or the last deceit that she is inceptible of a noble the last.

"My no ther and she were noter to the interest policy of a little beautiful them in their policy dept. and a little had forgetten it. They were civil on with the rit, but they be a comp from each other, each pos essing a suite of apartments at different sides of the house.

"One day there came a stranger to Woo Brook-a man still y unt, but with a look of sorrow and resignation. I was a If the child, it is true, but I never shall forget the impression his appearance made upon me.

"Easton and I were in the great hall when he entered. My gran likther was centined to his byl-he was always ailing; but I remember distinctly that it was my mother for whom the gentlemm inquired. However, it was not my in the, but Mrs. Amory, who obeyed the summons.

"I was sitting at the fort of the stairs when she came down, spin lilly dressed, but so pule that I remarked ittradiling violently, and clutching at the banisters for sup-I rt. Her lips moved as she passed, but uttered no sound, an I she walke I on into the reception-room, leaving me quite frightened at her appearance and manner.

CHAPTER XI.

THE STORY CONTINUED.

Walter Stuart paused for a moment, but I motional him to proceed, and he went on with his narrative.

"It might have been half an hour after, when I was recome by a quick step on the stairs, and my mether appears, which which than the muslin robe she work—her lips compress her hands clasped like one in mortal arony. I did not dure speak to her; she sped by me like a spector. Her wouldness fall devoted creature—stood was blog her from the landless. My mother paused in the hall, and called in a structure viscos.

"Dil you say in there, Maritte; dil y a say in the re?

"There was a sound from the regitier medicine copened and the stranger appeared.

" 'Isabel, Isabel!' he cried.

"My mother turned, tottered, and we did have fallen if he had not caught her in his arms and carried her has the real he had just left.

"I saw nothing further, for the derich to all the shricked and stamped, no attention was paid to remail the mail came down and tried to paid the, but I paid to real, screaming:

"They will kill mannas; they will kill a.

"Half an hour might have possed, when the least of again, and then Mrs. Amony consecut. I have read so the plant has she presented. Her their half half half half half and her face was so convoled with poster that she had like a find. The goath means to him their ready poster half my mother, whose eyes were shet lith and show hat her frame every time Mrs. Among gove way to a new hours of wrath.

". You shall rue this hour, Isabel Stuart! she exclaimed, "Litterly, and your whole life long shall you repent it,"

"She swept up the broad stair-case, and my mother drew heredi from the stranger's support with a low cry. While they stool trying to recover themselves, my mother's maid came down.

" Malam,' she sail, 'your father commands this gentleman

"A i w whispered words passed between the three, then the to leave his house.' stranger went out of the door, and my mother sunk almost lif les up a low seat in the hall. Another servant appeared tan ! s...!:

" Your father wishes you, madami

"She rese, shivering with a sudden chill, and went up stairs, i'r the first time in her life heedless of my calls and entreati s that she would speak to me.

"All r that, I have no distinct recollection. All was confish n-veins talking buily-my grandiather raving like a La lara -Mrs. Am ry exultant and fiendish, and my poor matier pule, ellent and despairing.

The next day, my mother took me into the sick man's re in; he hardly netice I me, saying to her-

"I. J. I, I will never again se your face; but promise me, for my double's sake, that you will live at the Hermitage until your bey is of a re-until he is twenty-three years oldtwenty-three, remember.'

"He was so urgent that she consented; she did not understand his full meaning.

"We left the hone, my mother and I, and went to a vil-It is veral miles away, and accompanied only by the servant

"Two days after, there came tilings of my grandfather's 1

"We want back for the last time to Woodbrook.

"Mrs. Am ry did not speak or look at my mother. After the limital, we all as mile lin the great drawing-room, and the will was rad. Of care I did not then pay attention or u. l'r t. n. l'its contents - l'ut I have l'um l'their import well Charle since.

"Tomake my stry plain, I must police k to my mether's Sill of Sheard my ment had be a the becilial but penniless wards of Mr. Amory, although the two were no relation to each other. He had two sons and a stipmin; lesite those a nephew, who spent much time at the leave.

"Both my mother and Louise Gillett byel the Liter, but he loved my mother.

"I do not know what arts she employed, but Louise made trouble between the two, parted them, and had him expelled from his uncle's house; for where she hated she was applied demon. She married George Amory for his forture, and may mother become the wife of Walter Struct from cruticals for his attachment, and she knew that her have had his late for ever, believing her guilty of treach ry and more re-

"The elder brother married, but both he and his will died soon after their child was born, so he was born alt up in his grandfather's house; that boy was Bothen Amay. Son after my birth my father died, and my mother what to like with her father in-law; and after the death of her her in Amory came there also.

"It appears that my mother and her firmer salt relief cred the fulschood imposed upon them, and her terminal-that was the occasion of the visit of which I have jest spalen. I do not know all that happened—my mather a core siller to rive me the full details. But I know that Mrs. And my so far forgot her pride as to throw here if et his a state of the rejected her with containing the mestive slight which rendered here of miles.

"When she left my mother and him to ther, is must to my grandfather with more fals how, and indicated his mile to such a degree—for he was herribly to indicate the could influence l—that he yowed my mother is the property marry his hope w—should ask Mas. And the rest ness or leave his house forever.

"She did not heliate. It appears that the real is protected was again but all too, to live at the Hermanian will be twenty-three.

"The will was opened and real. Mrs. Among and it is shared the firtune on one condition, which is a shall have presently. My methor and I were led in the case, and the mentioned his express desire that she should heep her process.

ire and live at the Hermitage, adding a hope that if she did not marry again, her sister-in-law would share with her the property, but making no stipulation which would be at all binding. The illa of any one's trusting to the generosity of an Amory!

"We went away-although a child, I was glad to escape from the gloomy walls and the presence of Mrs. Amory, who sat staring at us with her flery eyes that were eager still for vengeance.

"Not many months after that time my mother married the lover of her girlish days; all Mrs. Amory's arts had failed at length-they were united.

"There followed for my poor mother a few months of such la; iness as she had never known, for her husband was one of the noblest and be t of men. I know I loved him from the firt, and had he been my own father he could not have trated me with more kindness and affection.

"They were not rich, but wealth could have added little to the lappiness of hearts like theirs. It must have been a the anguish she had endured, but it was as short-lived as are most visions so heavenly in their glow.

"My st p-1 ther was elliged to go to New York upon im-I stant busines in the height of summer. Only three days after his departure, my mother was summoned—he had been She reached with chelicia and there was little hope. She reached the place in time to see him die, to catch his last word of Indention the giery of her life was quenched in a Link of the that the dawn would never break again.

"Hedled in her arms, murmuring Hessings on her and her ciall, and once mere my mother was a widow—once more we st llelil sand forsaken in the world.

"My m. ther was heart-breken, but her weatle firmness dial in final her. She saw what was to be done, and never file in a She hel an annity of a few hundreds which had n lett her by her second husband, and upon that she could Tit. We lived upon that pittance-Mariette still clinging to in, and we making our home at the Hermitage. When I the tel college my mether sil sme valuable jewels to diry my expense. I dil not know it at the time or I Similard have permitted the sacrifice—I was wrong to use that word, my mother never condidered it such.

"To-morrow I shall be twenty-three. This place we have so long called home must fall into the hands of our entire, to be squandered as the rest of their fortune has been. I am glad to leave it; I have never breathed freely within its precincts."

He paused for breath, but I did not speak. I had not interrupted him by a word during his recital, which may appear dull as I have narrated it, but which was rendered very interesting by his manner and energetic speech.

"Are you tired, Madge?" he asked.

"Tired, no! Oh, Walter, your por mother-that wicked, wicked woman!"

"Now, Madge, for the present! There are certain things you ought to know, although I run the risk of offentley you."

"Go on," I said, hastily; "go on."

"There was once a poor girl," he continued, in his soft, pleading voice, "taken by a wealthy family, rear I and I have ury, rendered unfit for contact with the craimary world, yet with no means provided to preserve her after happinesses treated only as a pretty pupper, to be thung a like the instant she offended or wearied."

"Go on!" I muttered, for he had promise I crain. There was a choking in my throat, a will whirl in my brain; I could only repeat my command—"Go on."

"There was a young man—handsome, gill I, i.s incident whom she had known a boy. He was interest I in the full, and by his careless kindness, wen perhaps in real trib. The itude."

"This is wrong, it is cruck," I crick hecklar the migrational mount to my face.

"At times one must be cruck in order to be him!" in wored, gravely. "This noble girl had no friend he cruck enough to tell her the truth."

"Utterly selfish had be been from his early point. His recklessness led to his exposion from all well with wars and a spen library. Although still young he had masted almost the whole of a princip from a St. Mar. e.e. interested in that young phl wars left Mar. that man is Easton Amory?"

He had spoken so rapidly that I had found no time to interrupt him-indeci, pession so choked me that for a few instants I had not the power to speak. At last I broke out:

"You have lind-you are a base, false coward!"

"I have spoken the truth, Madge; oh, be warned in time l"

"I will not hear a word more; leave me instantly!"

"I tell you, Madge, by the terms of his grandfather's will Le is forced to marry his cousin Louise, or both forfeit the estate—at least what there is lest of it."

"Thre is not a word of truth in your whole story," I exclaimed. "I would not believe you though you took a there in leaths! Leave this place, sir-go at once!"

"Whom have we here?" called out an angry voice.

Before I could speak, Easton Amory ran down the slope and steed belie me. Walter Stuart rose, pale but very calm.

"My worshipful cousin, as I live!" exclaimed Easton. "Treper! I'll have you driven away like a dog if you come here again."

"Best him, Easton," I exclaimed, quite beside myself with rage; "kill him-any thing! He has told lies-lies of you, so good, so kind!"

Andry tranel toward him with a furious gesture, but Walter Smart wave I him back with a calm smile.

"We will not quarrel," he said, quietly; "you know that I have speken emy the truth. For that poor girl's sake I bas wat helpen; I know you thoroughly; I have warned i. r; if she will not heed me, Gold help her, I can do nothing more."

An, my sprang toward Lim with a carse. Stuart kept Lis Truck I firmly, but I style 1 between.

"No queriel," I sold, for now I was weeping convulsively; "you must not quarrel."

"We shall not replied Waller. "Ersten Amery, I am i distillation the term between I was deny, if you can, that is a horse decrived this parentle. You are obliced to many a sing a major hard of the state of the section of the

I have the second of the second secon

"Eny that it is no " I man and it " if you would not kill me, say that it is not true."

"He can not!" returned Smart; "he dare not! Remonsber what I have said—farewell."

He sprung over the wall, but cast back one parting glance. "Poor Malan," I heard him mornour; "particle Malan!"

I sat down upon the ground, weak and hint now that the excitement was part, and we ping such bitter tears as had never before fallen from my eyes.

Leton's embrace resulted me to myell; he cutrated mo to be calm—to forget it all.

"Is it true?" I asked; " is it ty m-enly till m."

"Such was the will," he replied; "but I have no intention of complying with it; I would be a began in at. D.1 put think I could give you up, Maker?"

"No, no! I knew you call not be so crack"

"I fairly hate Louis ; you know that I have you better than the whole world, better than like it alf."

"You would not decive me; you would not-"

"Do you believe the list of that wretch?" he interrupted, struly. "Have you no faith in not can you not trult mutic your love less than mine?"

"N, n, He to ! I would not be it on and who space a sint you. I have nothing but you in all the world; no one cles cars for me—you savel no from a lite for ey. Is not my like yours?—Is with it what you will."

"My brave, my beautiful Madge !"

The tears I should then were sweet on its thing; they were should upon his boom. While I by dog to be his brack, there was a quick step upon the cour; rot one it and there has a distorted which a path to a path the path in a distorted by the path is a path to a path the checking her banks while her open things in a line of the path and the path in a path of the path and the path in the path in a path of the path in the pat

We introduced back—there was actidertaily and an interference who had never some her except with the smiller flow its worse to the weekt, would never have required his boundful we man in the livit, breakt is for when had so unexpectably broken in apan our will be produced.

CHAPTER XII.

THE PARTING.

I HAVE no distinct receilection of the occurrences of the next for ments. I remined perfectly helpless, listening to the trille har the auttered by my companions, as they stolr. Il =, m. l, yet alike in their pasion.

I was not at all afraid, only weak, and at length I struggled up from the ground where I had sunk. Mrs. Amory seized no by the arm, and shook it violently, leaving the mark of her therers upon the fish for days after.

"Dan Pale shrickel rather than spoke. "Little nameles, hereich! Is this the reward of my kindness-this the matter's I receive for all that I have done? But you i. Il to fine cut into the world to starve—die—what you will! Sut move how you will not stay!"

"S' p. m. lun, are yet had?" exclaimed Baston, pashing Ler really away. "Take care! you know that you have in and will egal to your own. If you send that girl from here, I go too, and you and your daughter will see me no

For was silette while; but Easton could always more." " in her. Singlewell her lip with inquitant fury, undea the tenter of the market and then spele more quictly:

"What is to be dear a Certainly things can not go en at this rate; I will not permit it? Is my date later to be insulted his a learning for that the fart-that become

"B' cereid!" he hied from letween his teth. "Be careful!"

The may be forms, Deten Amery, so am I. There ment bas til mat bewenus. Thanks to your realiess life, we are almost ruined."

"Thank yours har he retarted; "your mambling debts will mer: than ever the comes that comes to us to-merrow; be-Siles, it is already dispression."

She grew very pale, and bern to trand.

- "You do not mean it," she sail; "you have not that I to
 - "Not dare!! Do you know me no inther than that? There is nothing I fear."
 - "You may the law," she returned with anary velous in the
 - "Let me see you call it to your assistant," and he had a line insultingly. "It is you who would not dare. It if you prove the begans in tool of this girl; has it her again at your peril!"

If a look could have killed, Eston Am my while have have moved from that spot where he stod; hat bill is she was, Mrs. Amory carel for her own interests. After that the thorst of rage, her s lithing a restered her calmines.

- "Let that girl go away," she sail; "you and I met talk without a witness."
- "Oh, you led that," he replied, he waiter easin; "per feithat, do you?"

Mea Amory cleached her hands until the crist to it on upon her write stiff and rigid, but she did not answer him.

- "Go to the Leus, Males," she will to me, in a like this; "and as you value your life, he pailed."
- "Yes, go, Madge," Eleton all lawlers I purel, and at his bidding I left them.

view; it must have been a terrible one.

Intermed to the home, walking shouly and that it is the one stumed by a blow. I had not recall by a blow. I had not it will be a first it is a sound that excitement, almost it may, a sound that I had just its a term a sixt is it.

"Are you ill?" the house, a practically in I and the hold; but I hurried on without a war, and I have the whisper to a housemaid:

"I believe my soul that girl is crazy!"

"She was always quer," was the reply; but I was a ville-

In the quiet of my chander I at lown and tried to think, but my hard was dimy and a dutily side of a real hard my norway. I must have remained there are writed here to consider the property of the property

At last I want out into the hall—the confinement of my chamber somel chaking me. It was dark, but the lamps wron to be in confirment to be in confirment. sin; I could not all whether it was really so or only my troubled imagination.

As I st lin the hall, Louise came out of her room, I will the older of as she always was of an evening. She went by me without speaking, humming a low tune. A moment after, she returned.

"Mamma wishes you to go to your room," she said; "and you are to ster there until she chooses to call you; be good enough to remember that."

I are all without a word of reply; I would not sufficiently unding her pany malies to user a syllable of expostulation.

S. it la bok of hatrel at me, muttering:

"I will dal some mems of bringing down your prile before

We are my cil r, or my name is not Louise Amery!"

I builted as semilally and surringly as I could. The and of that litter in priment caraged Louise almost beyond endurance.

"Little millite in she has I, "I would like to take you Suhanl sil you fra slave; and I will, too. I believe land ner-Id, intel

I harried again, enter I my room, and deliberately closed il. der in her hee, leaving her bher own reflections. I her his stamp her foot with passion and matter firth r thrank as show that away through the darkness, but I had no time to sport in considering her anger.

I with order many house. I had eaten nothing sing in raing but I fit no han the man is left fool would have suffocated me.

Is a with my lands classed over my kn, waiting listering that that something was about to happen—longing to has the liew fill, that I might harm the worst and propare myself to meet it.

Then I -t, hading only the man a track ticking of a clock lational, till than our lamble drove me out of the residence of the first the above of the state of the I have the property of the acry that we will bring the while he is hill me in home, for my botton grows of the interest that I seemed to see dim shapes starting up amid the gloom—florce, angry faces mowing and jeering at me as they pass. I. I heard a voice in the gall-ry that I believe would have roused me from the delinium of a fever. It was eally a whisper, but to me it sounded loud and distinct.

door with all speed. He came toward me, emittace in hurriedly, and said:

'I leave here instantly—start to-morrow in raing for Elerope; when I return every thing will be well."

"Going!" I repeated, "going!" stunned by the sull and 3 of this last and greatest blow.

"I shall not be absent long; believe me, M. lga, it is better so; only have patience—only wait."

At that moment Louise's voice sounded in the lower hall. Easton gave me one kiss, and hurried away; then I stand in the gloom utterly bereft and alone.

"Going! going!" my lips kept mechanically repeating, until it seemed to me that another voice to k up the conplaint and mimicked the distress of my own.

The wind surged up with a low wail from the lights of the forest as the hours were on, and I sat in my claimler keeping a terrible visil. There was a bad n weight on heart and brain, pressing closer and closer until there cannot a paroxysm of pain so violent that my overwrite it never could bear no more; there was a sensation through my while body as if life itself were forsaking me—then I real mothing further.

When I returned to consciousness I was lying up a tier floor, and the cheerful morning light shone in at the wild at I could not stir, and I saw that my dress and the care that around me were wet with blook. I tried to think, to was incapable oven of that slight mental effort, and again I fainted.

When I came to myself, I was still all no, went as he from but free from pain. I knew then that I had broken a little vessel, but I did not feel afrail—something told me it had saved my life.

I suppose my almen e at last attracted attention, for almost midday Mrs. Amory's maid opened the door; but with one lack of herror toward the place where I lay, ran out scresming:

"She is dead! she is dead!"

Her cales translate the whole household to my chamber—or n Mrs. Amory cham. They raised me and haid me on the left Common humanity, or at least the presence of those around, compiled the women to send for a physician, although I do not imagine that she cared particularly whether my like was saved or not.

The destroime, applied such remelies as were necessary, in lead of that I should have the most perfect repose. The repose was an unimportant one, he said, caused by some intense mental excitement.

They was it I the blood from my face, change I my clothes, and lat me alene; for that I was grateful.

Mrs. Am sry came close to my bed before she went out, an I whispered:

"Male, you have been an ungrateful, whoke I girl, but I still not a new a new away if you promise never to mention what happened yesterday."

White the words she left me, but the pardon she so cartly rid i was controlled by the firsh in her eyes. I knew that it was only far of Eston which had in beel her to treat me so leniently.

I had dorming by a main there no longer. As some as I was able, I wall have the horse for ver. That thought was the property and the property wish was to get away from every sight ere in bot the part of the part of the pain of the miserable destiny for larger man. I had no hope left, no strength; I would be like have term buy a may plilow and dish, but that could not be.

I delt at an apt to a der my ell with the thought of lin media; Esten Amery; something tell me that we be equal to a train. My lone seemed to increase with the decided army I called a I be Nevel a thing they had a language to have a line of the element death.

I buy in bed for many that, smill ring nothing, but dreatfaily weak At length, one aftern n, I was alle to have my chamber. I went out into the hall; my steps were truebling and uncertain, but my strong will wall not pill—it overmastered the flesh and gave me power to that which I had wished.

I went to the picture-gallery. Deten's partiall hing

I can give no account of the hour I passed in that I made. Even now I dare not brush away the askes that have pattern over the grave of that time, and look beneath. I will not murmur and complain; let the arony of that soon I rest to tween God and the tertured heart which so made to tate by crushed and broken ever to heal.

I left that gallery as a mourner might leave at mi-culm enough, quiet and still, neither weeping nor homenties, but alterether desolate. I closed the deer safely, as if I is related a sound would evoke spirits in the plan, and ment my way.

I chose to go down stairs, and I went. I did not think of Mrs. Amory's anger; I should not have stapped for that. I felt very calm, but stony and cold, as if my whole his place.

suddenly changed to ice.

Lenies I had not soon since the day of Hot his dignitive; she never came near me when I was ill. I would not have desired her presence; but many a night had I would by her had, listening to her childish complaints, ten ling and caring for her, only to be childen and blanced for my point.

CHAPTER XIII.

TEMPEST AND SHIPWRECK.

I stoop in the lower hall, near the entrance to the library, the dar of which was ajar. I heard Mrs. Amory's voice in sharp, eager questionings, and that of Mr. Thornton, her man of business, in measured response.

I do not know why I remained. Their conversation hal 1) interest for me, and I would have reorned the meanness of playing the listener, but I caught Easton's name—that name which was always sounding in my ear, and it had a spell that chained me to the spot.

"There must have been knavery somewhere," exclaimed Mrs. Amory, passionately, "and it shall be my business to find out where it lies."

"Very near your own dor," replied the lawyer firmly. "The consect med extravagmen you have been running duing the let force a years would have beggard a prince, und, sin a his boyle of, your nephow has even surpassed you in his raid and expostulated, but in vain."

"I dil not comprehent," she mutterel.

"Only a formicht ago," pursual Mr. Thornton, "I was chief to raise frity the usual dellars for you, by disp sing cit katagreatle. You know better than mys if where it all went"

"It is your livings to supply the money, mine to dispose

The I with her old haughtiness.

"P Fig. in lan; but what the supplies are no larger : :: : :: :: ; who are your to thus but yours.if? Your Liling all the the the an iner-lille cim. When he l ... (I m., h. w.s freel, in a measure, to satisfy his creditors."

"I know nothing about these things," she replied, impatiently; "I can't be best I with a clatality. Gat marting in may I require without further content in. I have been but excuses and complaints during the last the years."

"Madam," answered Mr. Thurston, airest Silverly, "to sive my sail I could not rainy and har."

"What do you meth?" she excluded, with a salita poscion, which was a minding of an or and filling

"I m an,"—and even that calls sman of beines was so moved that his voice treadle had half-"I mean that place ruined!"

I saw Mrs. Amony full book in her civile-she but not fainted-but she was incomplifie of special at the facility of the contract of the contrac for the first time free liber by misr min.

"I have flithfully performed my track" outing I Mr. Thermton, "intemped at were univalidate. You have the parameter of attent—you and Hallen Autop. The have real religious man a hy-world restricted. Now that every thing is lest, now that the role I plant is a large since as close at your door has a many any in the I had me for your own folly and sin."

He turn I to have the rota, but that produced with the utterly humble I, howevelt blue to remain, with first L. T. L. i. Is and moaning piteously.

"Is there no help—none? There must be another but!
Why not sell the Hermitage—it is one new."

"You for at -your mainew has disperselled it -- and compaet between yourselves."

She motioned him to care, while a quite f prince tracted her forehead.

"Is there nothing, nothing?"

but to you it will some about the pury. I could to be prevent the following you.—I have so often done it in value. This is not and all it contains must go. Your town hours has long to mental it with mortane s—a fortune gone by the second is a labeled what you must look forward."

Mrs. Amery gave a grean. I never saw sich saffering and despuir up n any face as there was en here.

"Believe me, malem," he said, "I would not apput unnecessarily harsh, but you have so often of late insinuated things against my honor, that I am bound to clear myself. You can examine the accounts—they are all open to you; sin ly them and be satisfied."

She made no reply; did not appear conscious that he had allressed her; but those white lips muttered:

"My dan hier, my poor daughter!"

"She will have something when she comes of age. You remember by her grandather's will there are twenty thousand dollars left her."

"Cuit we use it now !" she esked, engerly, seizing the first desperate hope.

"Imposible! Ro one can touch it until she is twenty-one. It would only be a drop in the ocean now. By that time she may have grown wiser and better able to appreciate money than she is at present."

"Then there is no hope--"

" None !"

"There must be a me way-put things off-we shall contrive-"

"Every resource has been exhausted! Madam, I must repeat it—you are ruined."

He turned for the second time to go, and she did not attempt to ditain him. He passed me without a word, nor did I a the Lim; I was wholly occupied in watching Mrs. Am ry. She sat there so pale, so frightfully still, that I was afraid her reason would give way.

I went into the ro m, fell on my knees by her, took her Chillen lin mine, and besought her not to despair.

Sinchel at her with a sert of smile.

"(i," sin sall, "lave me as all the rest will. I can do I. While fir you now-I am a leggar. The whole world will know it soon."

I dill not speak; she so med rather talking to herself than addressing me.

"P ... l, and by my own madness! As for that boy, I c. .: I cure him, but I dare not! He must come back-yas, that will be best."

She paused, for the first time appearing to remember that I was present.

"Why are you here?" she ask d, angrily. "I don't went you-go away! I will not have you explain a my minery."

I was weeping unrestrainedly, and as sin int the tears full hot upon her hands, she booked at them and me with a will, incredulous wonder.

"I can help you no longer—I have no hame—no him he."

"Neither had I," was my answer, "until Gold at your Mrs. Amory, I owe every thing to your kindle so the had think I for at it! While I have two hand, and star the relief left, I will work for you. Hear what I sup—try to make restand me—I will never desert you—I will work for you always."

She was so crashed that my works so had her at another. She had her hand on my head, and for the first time work freely.

"I did not think there was so much go in a in any human being," she said.

"I belong to you," I replied; "I am only him my hay."

"But what are we to do?" size man, as the terr be truth recurred to her. "Who will tell L."

"I will, malam."

"My poor, poor child! Where on we bewind on we

"I will sattle every thing," I replied; " only had an array rest while I go and speak with Mr. Th. mat n."

At leasth I persual later to post later in a prove to see a quicting drops I know she had been in the mode of taking, and went away to the I Mr. There is a William I and convention, and, when it was one is to be here.

"You are a true woman' (i) on and and in i i r-i) i will help you!"

That was new largers to make no by hatter the had evertabled in that way! I had him to the hard the transfer to the hard the regions of the hard th

Desire the following west I and in the state of the first when the least the tilling and the state of the first was really iii. I went a very think to the cay, and Mr.

Thornton, arranged, with his assistance, an abode for the present, removed thither such valuables as I might, and at last all was ready.

There were many executions in the house, and magnificent as every thing was, the lawyer assured me it would be a mere nothing toward satisfying the creditors.

I was not confused by the suddenness with which all this hal eme up n me-I was firmer than ever before. New faculties seemed to rouse themselves in my nature-energies of which I had no perception-strength, nerve, power to manage—all that was necessary in such a time.

Mrs. Amory could offer no counsel-dil not wish to be consulted-she left every thing to me; and the most pitiable thing of all was to see that proud woman so utterly prestrated, leaning so wheliy upon the girl she had considered as little Litter than the dust beneath her feet.

When all was over, there remained to Mrs. Amory an in the cf a few hun Ired dollars, but to her it appeared the most absolute poverty.

The day left re that appointed for the sale, we all left Woodbrook forever.

It was now millennmer, and Mr. Thornton and I decided that it well be butter for them to remain in the country until antunn; after that, it was necessary for the furtherance of my plans that we should reile in New York.

It weall be under into the details of the few fol-Lawing we have We were established in a little house within a I w hours' till of the city. The dwelling was of the plainest derigion; yet, to many, it would dent these have seemed a conditable lane; but to these patted, enervated creatures it is a realizedy mit palle; and even I had become so en-! I ly burny and ill ness, that the privations were often

I had made arrangements i'r taking rooms in the city on hard to bear. the first of Saltemen. Mr. The ruten had promised to obtain frme a classical rawing. Up a that, and my skill in needlework, we must in a great me : the rely, since Mrs. Amery's little pitter a would be the same int for wants.

I has w that he will be of no as istance. She neither could nor wealt teach, or hit har hands to do any thing useful, She would do nothing but rail at her mother and Eusten, varying her programme by unlimited conlemnation of every thing I said or did.

Mrs. Amory was at length soized with a nervine fiver, and there was no one to take care of her but me, as Leuise declared herself ill also, remained in her room, and did not even see her mother. I had to prepare and carry up her meals to her—so she bade me—commanding me as if I had been a servant. Mrs. Amory pined, and not unnaturally, for luxuries which to her had become absolute necessities—in where to obtain them!

I did the best I could, and there the matter had to restno, it did not do that, for I was forced to listen to constitute complaints from both.

I know that Mrs. Amory wrote many times to Histon, but I concluded that the letters never reached him, as they remained ununswerel; and I was entain that he would not reluse to as it them out of what he had left, if he know the strait into which they had fallen.

The weeks were on, and autumn cause. We removed to the city about the middle of September. The round Mr. Thornton had found for us were in a small hour, on a refred but respectable street. My helpless charges pronounced in a vile den, and on the first night solded thems lyes to slope. I thought of Paralise Square, and was grat told for the roll which sheltered us, and which, with other limits, indicate have been made a comfortable home.

I found my pupils awaiting me; and the in the Irelied was recomably good. I performed the household determined procured a little girl to wait upon Mrs. Amorg. I. it by it had from one day's end to another, fretting, and relied to your novels; but I never attempted to find any finit which it.

I worked hard, growing thin and pile; but I did not have that. All day long I was engaged with my classes. Believe I went out I prepared their breakfist, and collect their distor when I returned; and all the evening I piled by a line often working until daylight when Mrs. Amony's familia brought some extra expense upon us.

Mrs. Amory had many beautiful dress and journs let, of course—these were gradually disposed of It was hard to bear with L. nise; she abused me constantly, as if I had been the cause of her rain. I never replied to her tauntsmy contempt i'r her really gave way to pity for her folly and helplesone's. She seemed to hate me worse than ever, now that they were, in a manner, dependent upon me, and I never went in her sight without receiving a volley of ill-natured speeches. Mrs. Amory never was harsh to me, but she would sit and l, k at me so her desly, asking if I meant her to starve or Ler, that it was quite as had to get along with her.

The winter came, and of course our expenses increased. Truth to say, I had un lertaken a great deal. But I did not filter-n tence dil I feel a regret or an inclination to retract from my resolve to take care of them. I werked day and night-p intel-sewed-made laney articles-wrote sketchesdid every thing, any thing, by which I could che out our little Louise might have turned some of her accomplishments to income. use, but she would not. Once Mrs. Amory did knit a purse, Lut she vowel it would kill her to think of selling and receiving money for it, although it had always been a favorite amir em ut with her. Louise teazed for all manner of useless things, and, whenever it was possible, her deting mother wend artify her, and I never complained.

We live I in this way for a year, but, alas, growing poorer entantly. Datan did not return, and many times Mre.

Amory would ex him pro innitely against his neglect.

I knew well he would never marry Louie, and I exulted in the the thirt-I had not be a human class. They had driven him away from me, but they had lost him likewise. I of he tallow my thoughts to dwell upon him; had I done at, I simil have smk down helpless and despairing.

I writed, werked, seeing no begain the fature, boking at the two arming daily more helples, and wond sing how har hills a my structh would save to their support. I len. I had not been becast the late work, and such conili. ii. i.', ... is t il, is very wearing.

I did the walling and ir hing, added to all the rest, for the Till was kept emiliar eccupied by Mrs. Amory or Levise, and hair, the was no bi-trained creature, willing coording but untile to do any thing will.

About this time Mr. Thernton died sublenly. I had lest my only friend! My class dwin had to a small number, and I found it impossible to procure more solubles. I struggled along as best I might, trying to be hopeful and some for with the least appearance of gloom up a my part, Mrs. Amory was in despair, and would take to be to be to be to be set of great and great appearance.

I am lingering over this portion of my hist ry larger than will be interesting. Let me lasten on,

I said that we had lived there for a year. The whater again came on—a cold, severe one it was.

"There are no coals," said the girl, one manifest as I was preparing to go out, "and the fire is low."

I had not a cent of money. I never could ask Mrs. Amory to dispose of any of her dresses, although she often did it, interest for such things. I stood perplexed and traid it, with a sharper pang of anxiety than ever below.

"Sure, and it's hard for year, Min," and the printing attendant.

These were the first him werls I had hard in m. aths, and the tears came into my eyes.

"Hush, Bridget!" I sail; "I can't be pitie!! We take:

do some way."

Nan Briggs. It was like touring my hout out to purt with the sole relie of my dead mother, but there was no all relieve it. I removed the chain from my no holds the little part with but, in the only Bridget was sent with it to the part of its It was a valuable ernament, in ! I have that she all this sufficient on it to purchase the coals.

That was the list sacrifice I was call to a to not in those women. I had now to harn what there is in to receive for the good I had trid to do them.

CHAPTER XIV.

THE SOLITARY STRUGGLE.

A FEW evenings after the sale of my cross, I returned home weary, dispirited, and with a nervous pain in my head that alm st drove me out of my senses.

Brillet met me at the door, exclaiming:

" Great news, miss, ye're all rich again!"

She always chose to consider me as one of Mrs. Amory's family, although Louise frequently told her that I was no better than a servant.

"What do you mean, Bridget?" I asked, stopping in the "Mane?-what I say, to be sure. A gintleman came in a narrow passage. giand carriage, and they are both gone with him. I have the caird, and we are to folly."

I thought she meant Easton, and grew sick and faint.

"Who was it?" I demanded.

"Sorra one o' me knows."

"Was he verm ?" I asked, impati ntiv.

"No, in led; ould and gray, and eres the tep o' that. But all enough they were—action like two leoniatics—the young one singing and dancing like mad, and the ould one not much better."

Sire, there's the caird; it'll till better nor me, perticler as I den't len w."

I took it, and read the address of one of the most fashionalle hotels in the city. Under it was scribbled, in Mrs. Amory's Land: "Comment ence, my good Made."

Diven then she randmirred the distinction between us-

Ir garing had changed her in tantly.

I went to the hatch accompanied by Bridget, and was shown into a part r, where Mrs. Amony sat with Louise and an old gentleman, whom the fermer introduced as her uncle, Mr. Forrester.

"Well, Mudge, we are off to New Orleans," were almost the first words. Mrs. Amery spoke; "so make as much haste as you can."

"My nices feels quite obliged to you for your little extrtime, Miss Malge," said the old grantle man, promise.

"But where would she have been but for manning charity?" exclaimed Louise.

"True," said Mr. Ferrett e, taking a pinch of small with the air of a marquis of the olden roller; "v ry tr..."

"You are to go with us," said Mrs. Amay; "you mant never leave me, Madge; when Louise gas I said by quite alone."

But, to their unbounded a tenishment, I refused. I had caten the bread of independence; although hard to erro, it was sweet to the tasks; never again would I live up a the bounty of any human being.

"Not go?" exclaimed Mr. Am ry. "What will pro-do ?"

"Work," I said, with a smile.

"One would think you had had enough of that."

"Why, mammy," said Louis, "It is her nature; who indis mest at home in her present situation. Lather dis."

"A strange taste?" ejeculated Mr. Forest, quite rel in the face at my importance in reading their elegant les withdrew his attention from me alter there are I began tollier in a low tone with Lorde, while Mr. Amory couldness terring her request.

"You much go, Malina I can the address to the blue will.

me."

"If I were necessary to your condition in I will never have you; but you have record in the unit will.

—you need me no longer."

"But you must have a home."

then. I can not longer so the both his dignition of them. It is my daty to weak, and I must be built.

"But I am accurate he has pen, Male. In his "

"Oh, medan," I sail, him dy, "there was in mary a no tro in y ar new home more gentle-handed and serviceable t'.... I."

Should a little at her own schishness, and, like many another, took refuge in anger.

"Then you refuse to go?"

" Tel met exense me-I can not."

"It is your own field. Whatever happens, you will have only yourself to blame."

"I she lit merer dream of accusing any other."

"Well, it's very un material, Malice. I shall always think SO. 19

"I am sorry, madam. If the time should ever come that you required me-if you were sick or in trouble, I would come to you gladly."

" (A, thank you; it is not likely; my troubles, I fancy, are " ...," and she drew herself up with all her old dignity-

"quite over."

She grew more offen led as the idea of her new state came clearly to her mind, and she ceased combating my determination.

I was a list in to Mr. Parrester's conversion by a really have in an wer to something Louise had said.

"I be in the calling," that in spite of his time talk and L. , this I had a second to have Multiple is a rh rh thredit a worling atradiction; the process of the factor in the last termed on him at once. . "It is very "this man of whom You know nothing. Easton Amory is much more incapable of the an interpolation of the whole special of a stranger as you have done."

The old gentleman : 1 M. Am ry were stricken damb tt til million in the line in

"Will a complete the side "Indone ought to be The It I was a little line of the property of the strains of the desired) :"

"I', 'n heart learn and heart to the last and the state they desired I The part will explain the I want on "He you have no all in in your little the the countries are of no value in your eyes, I would conceal the fact! I know that you were utterly heartless and despicably ridicalous, but I never at as I you of such miserable meanners." I had be rue more than her, and for once was determined to free my mind. The little viper was thoroughly enraged, but her you in had no off at.

one would think that you were in have with him, and you are! What impulence, to be sure—as if he would be it twice at you."

"I do love him," I replied, flarke sly; "I am mit all and to own it; and he loves me as much as he deplety yet. He would sooner marry a begrar than yet.—"

"Malge, Malge," interrupted Mrs. Amay, "to year and know? have I not told you-"

Lais sprang forward-put her had ver her methor's mouth, and prevented her concluding her said.

"Hyon tell her, I never will speak to yet till the day of my death!" she cried. "I do not the hor to ha we walt, wait! Well, Mis Parall (," she cational allowance mane, "have yet any main his distance als to make?"

"None—I will waste no mare werd up up up it. We use parting, doubtless frever, tall— yet al. ill taking beauty poor; in that care, Louise, return to the care, the marriet, and she will again provide you with a hate."

"Step, Malge," said Mrs. Amory, as I translated and the room. "Do not to havely! Tainly of the III policy with here! What wall be interest you here! You can not live! Mary out. "And it, policy be mad to hesitate even for a moment!"

"Malan," I sail, man thilly, "I am property that-I am sorry to appear united, but I come a "

"Not ungrateral, Male," should be placed as she realled the per per, "and to relate the blind to your own interests. Yet have been a late-I will say that, and weaked him a late to the Males P.

Still I sail no, no! I would have did not be and in the rather than have remained lenger with that will be a solution girl!

"It is much better as it is," sail Mr. For r, well in reprof; "the young perm is above her station; let obsti-ney and self-will take their own cours."

I did not even by a book show that I had heard his words, but Hilling Mrs. Am my firewell, left the apartment, followell by Bridget, who, them the corner where she had enscenced herself, had been a silent lest attentive listener during the whole scene.

"Sire, ye did the wire thing, Miss," said she, when we had regain I the street; "ye'd better work the fingers off ye than live that way."

I fully a med with her; any trials or sufficients would be coir to bear than the which must await me in the home they offered.

The next day I went out as until to my duti s, and when I returned, Bullet handed me a not tell was from Louise.

"Woll we have this in mint; mamma is quite sick, and der to sel you money to pay the rent and the serv. with I shall do no such thing-if you want it you must Lathy in pride entriets can after it."

That was a saving that! We owell a quarter's rent, and l r Britathalnathan pallin matta But I halb ruc too much to give way now.

I die milite to the best attantige perilled it was living and I cally to lower knows—stile the rent and gave up the house. The kind, devoted servant would have I i. i the many destar, but I in it I upon her receiving it, and then we say mated. Truly that parting was a bitter ent; I was having the lat human being who cared whether I lived or died. With such valuables as I still possessed, I betook myself to a little room in a street near by, less decent ut i chant, and in a dark, glammy tenement-house.

I was alter the whole world, but my courage did not desert me. It was not very long till spring. I thought that if I could straight on until the warm weather came, I should do much better.

I techt dully and well-it as hard as being, but could feel how my straight was no one to Conserved Myly is the new colony of the colon; interpolate report regions to contrast a Fill of his in the first of the first inch in more than Louisu's insults had done; I was need that to sach treatment.

The spring came, bright and beautiful even in the forl, globary streets—came and passed, and the his, contrading mid-summer took its place.

The last of my scholars form it me. I will disting the array to go to the ships and process with no matter what the hind and lit by I plint it several being from copies I had made of old politices in Mrs. And rais house; but finding it impossible to displace it had not it impossible to displace it in his not in the notion of the notion o

I tried to bring my old love of writing to my ail. I sure several little stories to dill rent papers. Sometimes they make published; but when I wrote for the pay, the answer coully was that they never gave any thing to first articles.

Before winter came, I were ellered to a learning believe tion for a much power on in a still dedice, desired on I mere pent-up portion of the city.

I be an to think, with nauth rable leading, of New Bright and Paralle Square! Was my deathly, after all, to be summated in that herefolds a table I is general factor of the Regulty I was being probable factor income down every day!

weak—my soul sickened within me!

Sometimes I have been the the continual house of the thought, then we all her being check the health and, forting that I was already gains and.

CHAPTER XV.

THE SPECTER'S APPROACH.

The winter was upon me, cold, bleak, terrible, and in its train came a gaunt figure, approaching nearer and nearer—it was starvation!

I had no money, and no means by which to procure any. Some time before, I had seen prizes for successful stories offered by some newspaper. I had written and sent one; but since then I had hear I nothing concerning it. For weeks but since then I had hear I nothing concerning it. For weeks I called daily at the office, but always received the same I called daily at the office, but always received the same answer: the rewards had not been distributed.

At last the man grew tirel of the sight of me—they had always to no ifficiently uncivil—and bade me leave my address always to no ifficiently uncivil—they would write to me it my install of coming any more; they would write to me it my strowns among these that were accepted.

I had some folious of pride left, and they rose bitterly archest the thought of revealing my alode; but what had I to do with pride I. After the first no ment of hesitation, I write my address upon a scrap of paper, and gave it to them. When the men had read it they looked at one another and When the men had read it they looked at one another and looked, but I went away here?

So I set in my correct room and white it, whited—but there was no clear to a retail to r. I was ill for some time—not with any article allocate, but hely and mind had become so with any article allocate, but hely and mind had become so with any article allocate it for days I could not rise from my could allocate but the for days I could not rise from my could allocate it in the latter when he a that the annels looked are for me, and so it might have been that the annels looked down upon me from a clear spot I could see in the sky, and the meaning it might have a latter than a first to

I will not the rise that report where I live!! I tried to have it heat; indeed, there was nothing in it but my mis rathe bel, a have been; there was nothing in it but my mis rathe bel, a sile comit, and a broken that a thing is in it but my massinst the wall.

While I was too weak to sit up much, there came, one day, a tap at my door, and, without bid ling, the lan linky entered a tall, gaunt, hard-featured, had-boking we han as case could fear to see.

She stared at me for a moment, and I turn I my eyes away, too feeble and wretched to care what her errant might be.

"Sick, ch," she grumble I, while her sharp, green eyes wendered to and fro about the 100m, "and sink filles can't work, and them as can't pay must trot,"

"What do you want?" I asked.

"Want, indeed—he! he! how inn cent we! I to be sare! Why, I want a week's rent—just have the goldness to go to your money-chest and fork it over."

I was speechless! I had but a f w point in the world, and where to obtain more I did not know.

"Wal," she continued, apparently enjoying my mute ilstress, "what's the matter—put no stuff, ch?"

"Nene," I replied, desperately; "I can be that this morning-wait until I am better."

- "Whit indeed! You don't betch this child with no such chaff—no indeed! I'll have my maney after I I we this room."
 - "But I haven't any !"
- "That's neither here nor there-year've got what'll answer jest as well."

"What, what?" I asked, eagerly.

but I'll take it; mabby I can not a few shillings in his

She pointed to a painting I had a to be interested pawnlooker's—one of the lest copies I had correctly with much much made than the painty was required to play in rent. I was too weak to content with har; when it is I should be driven into the streets.

"Take it," I said; "do take it and go."

She watched marker and is took he raid. Let her is enough out of the raid, he had not been a low of the raid, he had not a heart of the raid and the raid to the heat with some drawful thought in her heath he takes which I could not understand

The next day I was able to go out, although still very feeble. I had not a mouthful of food, and something must be obtained. I made a bundle of such decent clothes as still remained to me, and went to the nearest pawnbroker's shop. The amount I received was enough to last me for some time to come. I returned to the old weman, and offered to pay the rent in money if she would give me back my picture.

"No in !-!," sail she, with a grin, "I ain't so green as all that comes to! That 'ere pictur's mine, honey-just go al ng about your business, and mind, taint none of it going toward next week's rent, neither!"

It would have been the height of fully to have disputed her determination, and I wis ly lett her to herself.

I had now food, and my appetite returned. I devoured ravenously the provisions I had bear but. The bread was dry and black, the dried fish northly and litter; but never during my put his of luxury but any delicacus tasted so sweet to La as these course morsels. When my med was over, I by down and shipt; I had nothing else to do, and I felt tired after my walk.

But to linger over these details will do no good. If it Could serve to render the rich more thoughtful of those around them, I would de tile that time with minute it blity. But the spin; this of the world are not so easily excited; it sees n thing of solution; it can be the last there is a may fried the last want if they want if, and these who will not labor deserve no food.

Solt had hear need with a there are many who would not credit my story if I reveal ! the suffring of that com. But he are the man has the alleys and by-ways—hak into the land and the special of with house the inter-party of the land Carle (I.I) live - the wall one i was nother heavy in a despair-I. I. a. a. then say, if they can, that there is no truth in the pres. Latthem go in the call winter and stand on the letth where no the borns, where a mother and her help-I still same conclud, well then tell me these things are too horrible for belief.

CHAPTER XVI.

IN THE DEPTHS.

Again I was without money! The last few shillings I possessed went to satisfy that avaricious of I woman, and as she left me she shock her head significantly, and pointed toward the street—the foul, loathsome street, where the wretched walked, the haggard, lost and miscrable congregate l.

"You'll have a wide home very soon," she said, with her frightful chuckle, while her green eyes dilated, "a wile home; you needn't pay no rent there—it's free quarters—tree quarters."

I had a few tritles left—they must go; food was very sweet, and I began to have dreadful cravings night and day. My constant reflection was of something to eat.

It was strange how little I thought of Louise or Mrs. Amory—they had gone so entirely out of my life that even their memory was faint and indistinct.

Of Easton I would not think—I should have gone mall hal I allowed my thoughts to wander toward him. Often, when I lay on my bed, moving to and fro in feverish, broken slumber, which was not rest, his image rose before me palp I bland distinct. I would wake with his name on my lips—so ming to feel the closp of his hand on mine—his kies warm on my cheek—wake to want and suffering, trying to stifle my crist, and at least die in silence.

At last I grew desperate! Was I not for then by every hum in being? Why should I struggle any leaver? So not or leter I must sink down-down-to the lowest depths of misery-if there was any slough durker than I had yet trad. God would not I tome disches had deserted me likewise.

Then hely recollections would come back-my methods voice would sound in my car giving me strength again. I would bear up a little longer; I would not take my own lift. Wait—wait; only a few days more—it must end then.

101

All my thoughts contract upon the means of procuring Treel, and of relaining possession of my garret. Every week that eld er nest of in my doorway, clutching her bony hands and bering at me with her green eyes—that sight was hardest of all to bear.

mat I'm your only visitor, except the rats; I guess they (ottes to see you often enough; hope they don't eat up your nice virtuals! Oh them rats, they're wicked critters! Once they middled a deal man's face in this very corner; guess they had better livin' than he had had for some time. Do Westerns a Lim? There's several folks left the place 'cause they will be retruded on 'em-he! he!"

I know how silly it was, but I could not forget her words. Winn night came on, and the great lean rats began to play ti, it the garret, I had no strength to scare them away. I Cull hear them nibiling at the dead man's face. I could hear the carerness with which they feasted upon the little flesh still clinging to his bones.

I did not dread his appearance; I was near enough crazed to land a believer in ghosts, but I so longed for company that I should not have been afraid had he risen and come to sit beile me. Nothing appeared; there was no sound but the patt ring tread of the rats that used to look at me with their hangry eyes as if wondering how long before they should fast up n makes they had on the dead man before.

My chi frenzy grew stronger! I would rise from my bed in the millio of the night, and go to my window that I might look down the street that led into Paradise Square. I the the mouse in which old N m and I had lived, and I haughed again as I thought how the plant will some more my home, only then the str that he my reting the. Well, the flags were not so at ay as herein here. I could die there.

My vi in a megan; my dathing, with the exception citie in a I was and that home about me in rags; I had i. ir ill i ; notilin softhe story I had hoped to get money from, and rent-day again at hand.

It is two days' grace. I do not know what moved the wreach, but she granted my prayer.

No more, mind you, not an hour—not a minute! Pay or tramp—the street is broad—there's money to be made! What a fool you must be to set here a starvin'! Why, I knows them as would dress you up and give you the best goin', for you was a pooty critter when you come here—jest the sort to take, with your red lips and black eyes."

I did not half comprehend her meaning, but enough was plain to make me turn away, shuddering. The woman gave her low chuckle again, and went out, saying:

"Now mind, two days, no more! No doubt there'll a great fortin' come to you afore that time—he! he! Tho angels is very good, I heard a preacher say once when I was a little gal, and he talked about a Gol. Wal, mabby there is one, but he don't live in New York if there is!"

Two days more and I should be houseless—no shelter but the broad sky—no refuge but the streets. I sat down in blind despair. I did not pray—I had no thought of it! The old woman's words seemed true—there was no Providence in that loathsome place.

With it all, I was very hungry. I had a few crusts led, but I did not dare eat them then, as yet I could exist—they must be reserved for sharper pangs. I was forced to put the moully crumbs out of sight, they increased my cravings so fiercely.

The first day passed—the night came down. The rats let their hiding-places and played fearlessly about me as I sat on my low stool looking down toward Paradise Square; they glared at me with their sharp eyes as if they were thinking of the banquet they had made upon the dead man, and licked their jaws with their red tongues as if tired of waiting for me to become their prey.

I sat there until the daylight broke. The great city struggled into life. The sunbeams gilded the stately church-tower where they preached of God, and thanked Him that they were not as other men! I did not move out of my seat or turn my eyes away from Paradise Square.

It was a Sunday morning—a culm, glorious day in milwinter. I heard the church-bells ring solemnly, but the sound came from a distance; there were no temples of wership near. The wretchel objects around had no thought of prayer—how should they have had?

103

The day dragged on. True to her promise, the old woman kept al A, but the day was almost gone-and then?

A will twice kept repeating the words in my ear until they s unled like the meeking of a fiend-and then?

The street, the goal, starvation or crime—and then? Hush! The river run black and deep. I caught the gleam of the waters in my window; under their waters there was rest!

The last black crust was eaten. I could no longer resist the temptation, and my teeth cranched over it with the same sand as in my dreams I had heard the rats tear at the flesh of the dead man.

Titere was shouting and riot in the street below. There was a ringing of Sabbath bells in the distance, and the strange mingling of sounds surged up to my garret with appalling distinctness.

The daylight faled; lamps began to gleam after off; a fow stars sint into the sky. The wind rose, sweeping through my narrow room, ruthing my thin garments, and moaning sadly in my ear.

Hanger had quickened my faculties to terrible acuteness. I land a hary step on the stairs several floors below. I knew what was coming then.

Trang, trang, up the rotten strire ise—through the dark France, trump, tirm, heavy, unrelenting, till it First berein was flung Circu. and the eld erme stood there, excited by drink and evil 1 -- 114.

" No maker, key? Out with ye-start, don't stop another minute, or I'll illing you out of the win low! Cheating a lone w nan after this fishion, you lazy animal—start yourself?"

"Give merey." I plead d; "only have merey."

"Dan't talk to me! There ain't three women in the world Weill to what I have, but you shall go now. Curse youout into the strate will do as your betters have done before Your stall muricin, turn your premy fare to account; do any thing year an, but don't think to cheat honest folks."

I fall on my hands before her; I pleaded by every thing that had being strol; she did not even understand the Wirls. Since in land by the shoulder and pulled me up; I was proceed the grap. She dragged me along the largest and down the stairs, striking and cursing me. The wretched inmates of the house crowded about their doors and laughed at the sight, while she pulled me down—down, opened the outer door, and pushed me into the street. The heavy bolts closed behind me with a crash, the key turned in the lock, and there I stood!

It had come at last; I was houseless, starving-in the street that led to Paradise Square!

The wind blew sharp, as if each blast had been barbed with icicles; a few flakes of snow fell now and then; the sky was cloudless; the moon and stars shone pitilessly. Nowhere could I turn for help; neither earth nor heaven had mercy; men and angels alike stood aloof. My hair streamed out upon my shoulders; my tattered dress fluttered in the winderes and heart were so wild!

There was no fixed purpose in my soul; I was too nearly mad for reflection. Unknowing wherefore, I turned up the dark street, passed into another, and stood in the entrance to Broadway.

Bright and far streamed the luster of a thousand lamps; carriages dashed past; crowds swept by me, none heeding me as they went. I went over and stood upon the other side, passed down a cross-street a little way, and sunk upon the stone steps of the nearest house. How long I sat there I do not know. I felt the wind cutting through my veins, turning my blood to ice. I thought it was the last pang; death must be near me then.

A tall form, shrouded in a cloak, left Broadway and turned down that very street. The step was quick and vigorous; I knew it in an instant. It had been long since I had beard that sound; my brain was almost turned with sickness and want, yet I knew it!

He came on—he was close to me—the folls of his clock brushed my thin garments. I saw the gleam of those eyes which had so often looked lovingly into mine—the face whose Encaments were so Lestingly impressed upon my soul.

I could not utter a syllable, but I flung out my arms in mute appeal. The action attracted his attention; he glane I toward me, threw some money on the pivement, and was passing on. I had no words—my throat was so husky and dry, my tongue clove to my mouth, but he must not leave me then. I cried ent like one in the agony of death. Again he pane'--ben me-drew near-ben over me-and then, the eth all the change, he knew my face,

"G: d Heaten!" Le exclaimed. "Madge, is it you?"

"How came you here?" he cried. "Can't you speak? My Gal, she is freezing! I will get a carriage, Madge.

He led me to the corner, hailed a carriage that was passing, and when it stopped assisted me in, sprung after me, gave seme direction to the driver, and away we sped.

He asked me no questions. I could not have answered them; I could only he back in the seat, feeling life slowly net minime, from the warmth of that fur-line cleak.

West; lat lat; he helped me out and led me up the steps of the later. He opened the door with a latch-key, and intrini me through the hall up stairs. He drew me into a landries chamber, brought me wine and bread, and I swallowed them eagerly.

Of the next few days I remember nothing. When I recovered my ranson, I was lying in bed, while a woman was Wall him being moments I could recollect In this I had happened, then all came back, and I roused In a li white a trint cry for Eiston.

Is mik back with a gush of blessed tears. Life was restored to per -n tonly like but love, and all that could make it worth the having.

The mat maing I was able to rise and dress myself with ut assistance. Nothing had ailed me but hunger and eal. I was quite well again. I i and be like saloon; I amused myself as best I Living lar laston-neither wondering nor caring Where I might be, certain that I was in his charge, and that all was well.

CHAPTER XVII.

THE DRIVE.

That day and the next I passed alone; but there came two notes from Amory—he would soon be with me.

On the third morning my maid proposed that I should drive out, and I consented. She had prepared a rich carriage-dress in which she attired me. When my toilet was complete, she bade me look in the glass; it was my old self-older, paler, but beautiful will.

We took a long drive, and I leaned back in a dreamy content, enjoying the golden sunlight and the keen air, while the woman sat silent and respectful, but watching me curiously all the time. We went far out into the country, and when I returned I felt stronger, more like myself, than I had done since I left Woodbrook.

As I descended from the carriage, a boy was standing at the door, with a note in his hand; he held it so that I could read my name upon the address. Thinking it was from Easton, I snatched it from him with a few incoherent words, and hurried into the house.

When the maid attempted to follow me up stairs, I bade her go back. I went to my room, tore open the note and read:

"Madge:—Easton Amory was married to his cousin Louise the night before he sailed for Europe.

"WALTER STUART."

I stood for a moment damb and unbelieving, then the events of that evening, Louise's hint, all came back, and a conviction of its reality burst upon me.

"This thing is true," I said, "all true!"

I felt no anger, hardly despair. I was icy cold, my voice firm and low.

"I do not curse him," I said; "God will do that! I do not ask for vengeance—the Father of all will give their due to both the wronger and the wronged! I marvel how I could have been so long deceived."

I took the jewels from my wrists and laid them on the table, flung off my outer garments, muttering to myself:

"Saved ! saved !"

I sat there for hours, reflecting upon those things; many times the mail came to the door, but I ordered her coldly away.

At last a terrible fear soized me—Amory might return and find me there. I started up in a sudden frenzy, opened the discr, and without bonnet or shawl, fled down the stairs into the passers. The woman who had waited on me was standing there. She uttered a cry of dismay at my approach, and would have detained me, but I pushed her aside, and on I went—again in the street—homeless, friendless!

CHAPTER XIX.

PARADISE SQUARE AGAIN.

Ir seemed to me that I was treading the billows of a mighty ocean—around me were clouds and darkness. No stars were in the sky; a mingled storm of rain and sleet fell pitilessly on my bare head, but I heeded not.

On, on I fled, seeking only to escape from them; whither I went it did not matter, only to be away. I met no one; even the watchmen had deserted their posts, frightened from duty by the awful violence of the storm.

My dress clung tightly about my limbs, my hair fell drenched and loose around my neck, winding in coils around my throat and arms, till their touch was like that of scrpents, and I shook them off in sudden horror. I had no idea of my whereabouts; I did not even think, but still fled on, on.

Once I heard a clock strike just overhead, so I knew that I must be under the shadow of a church. I shoutel and laughed with the madness which was upon me.

I sat down upon the steps of the church, while spectral figures started up out of the impenetrable darkness and moved about me. There I sat until the frenzy which ruled my sail forced me to go on, aimless and blind, through the sterm.

When morning broke, the tempest lulled its fary—there was promise of a beautiful day. I was exhausted, faint, partially crazed, but something told me that I was not safe in the fashionable part of the city where I found myself. I sought the close streets, went down the narrow alleys, and wandered on toward Paradise Square. Early as it was, bath-some-looking beings were astir, human in nothing. They looked after me and laughed, but nobody tried to detain me. I had sense enough to know that I needed some other covering than my showy dress. I stopped a woman, and bartered one of the rings still left on my fingers, heedless of its cost, for the ranged showl she were. The creature's eyes glistened, and, snatching the jewel, she run off, fearful, I suppose, that I might repent the barmin; and I hurried on, still haunted by the ill a that I was pursued, and that there was no safety for me but in new flight.

I was in Paralise Square at last! I found the dwelling Wir P Nan Briggs and I had livel. There was nothing changed in the neighborhood, except that all looked older and more ruinous...

A tatterel, wretchel woman passel me, carrying a pail, while a sickly child cleary to her, whom she shook off with carsa I recognized her instantly. It was a girl with whom I had then quarreled in the old time. Our destinies had a sin joined for an instant. She did not remember me, passing on with a stare and a few rude words.

She went her way, and I went where the frenzy led meit so haife ned that it took me out of Paradise Square and up an all y into the street where I had lately dwelt.

I rained the least from which I had been turned out a week being-to me it seemed an age since I had last stood there! In the diserway I saw the old woman holding conversion will, a man, and in her hand was a letter, into which she was vainly trying to peer.

"I have a "hir about her," she was saving, as I ap-17 . h. 1; "sied's but me, and in debt. I wonder what this "Trie." Bire her curiesity could lead her farther, I started franciatel statched the letter from her hand, certain that it wis ber m. "Hite today I" she exclaimed, savagely; then i i in a who it was, she burst into a fit of laughter. "The is a purp bird, to be sure! Jest pay me the money values as an ar I'll pull them velvets off o' ye as sure as you stand here."

I file that letter braight me new hope, but I was careful It to and there. The man turned toward me and said s in that the ing paid for his trouble. I drew another ring from my finger.

"Divide this I tween you," I said, "only let me get back to my garret, for I want rest."

The man and woman bent over the ring together, examining it and me with looks of wonder.

"Sartin, sartin," said the old crone, "go right up stairs, me dear, you knows the way—it's all nice and comfortable there -go along, purty, go along."

I hurried past her up the tumble-down staircases, till I found myself once more in the little garret—it looked like home. I fastened the door with a stick, piled the table and chair against it, so that I should be roused if it were forced open, and sat down on the bed to read my letter. As I did so a bank-note fell from it and fluttered to the floor. I pieked it up—it was a fifty dollar bill.

I felt nothing—was capable of no sensation. I real the note—the story I had written so long before had received that premium. In the midst of my stupor came one thought, one desire—to get out of that great city. I rose and started toward the door, but fell back upon the bed.

I lay there like one excited by opium—I suppose the drugs I had taken so freely during the past week were still powerful in my system. I could neither sleep nor move. There I lay with open eyes, yet beholding the horrible visions which narcoties are went to call up. Terrible shapes—a long train of ghostly faces, passed in slow procession round the bed, carrying a shroud in which they tried to wrap me. I stood on the brink of precipices, and demon hands would push me over—down—down—into eternity. I was in Paris while the streets ran with blood, and the reign of terror was at its height. Then I was out upon a stormy ocean with only a plank between me and destruction, drifting slowly on, through cold and noist away to a sea of ice. Then for a moment all would fade, and I remembered where I was, sought to rise, but was unable.

Night came on before I was aware. I had no lump, and there I lay in the darkness. I can not describe half the terrible sights upon which I was forced to look; only these who have suffered from the improper use of opium can form any idea of my tortures.

CHAPTER XX.

THE AIMLESS JOURNEY.

When the daylight came I was stronger; probably I fell askep a little while before morning. It had rained again during the night, and the water lay in a pool in the mid lie of the chamber, penetrating my thin slippers as I passed.

Then I remembered my desire to get out of that house-out of that city which had become so horrible to me.

I crept from my room and down the stairs without being seen by the old woman. Once more in the open air, I felt a sense of security. The pawnbroker's shop, I had so often visited, was very near; I harried there at once. The keeper of the place recognized me instantly.

"Come to buy or sell?" he asked, with a chuckle.

"To buy," I sail; "let me see some of the dresses I brought here."

He to it down soveral; I selected one, some underclothing, and a bounct I had carried to him. I handed him the bill—he looked surprised and suspicious, but made no remark. I did not attempt to count the money he returned me; I could not have done it.

I make him let me go into a little room back to change my cirtles, premising him the garments I had on by way of payment.

I drawed myself as neatly as I could, put on the bonnet and a dee at shawl, and went away. After I had gone a little distance up the street, I remembered that I had left my money in the den where I changed my clothes. I went back immediately, but the Jew laughed my demand to scorn.

"Get out of this!" he cried, "or I'll break every bone in your bely! You left no money here, and you know it.

Clear out, or I'll have the Charlies on you in no time!"

I did not contend with him; my brain was too much confused entirely to realize my loss.

I went up the street, and found myself again in Breadway. On I went, turning neither to the right nor the left, quite out of the city into the open country.

I traveled all day, and when night came, entered a barn by the roadsile, and, lying down in the hay, slept soundly until morning. I left the place unseen, and continued my journey.

I was conscious of no object that I had in view—hal no reason for going on, except to escape, as far as possible, from that great city. I felt neither hunger nor fatigue—nothing but a sensation of relief in the strange quiet that reigned around. There was nothing in my appearance to attract attention, and I went on in perfect security.

I passed several villages, but did not stop in any of them. At last I begin to have a burning thirst, and paused at a farm-louse to beg a drink of water. The woman kindly gave it to me, asking if I was hungry. She brought me some pieces of bread and meat, and though I had felt no pangs of hunger, the sight of fool made me almost ravenous.

She as'ed me a great many questions, but I answered evasively, and, after resting a little while, went away. She probably thought me some insane person; I was not in the full possession of my senses. I walked more slowly, for my feet began to pain me excessively. I sat down by a brook that was partially frozen, pulled off my shoes and stockings, and bathed my feet in the icy water. I walked all that day, but I do not suppose that I went over twenty miles, although it seemed to me a long distance when I thought of it.

Where I rested that night I do not distinctly remember; I have a faint recollection of falling asleep, waking in the mill le of the night almost frozen, and walking on to keep from perishing.

About daylight a farm-wagon overtook me, and the man allowed me to get in and ride. I slept in the straw until he woke me and bade me get out, as he was going no further on that road.

It was then about noon, and the place where he left me a small, straggling village. I looked around, but something warned me not to tarry there, so I hastened through it, passed up the hill, along the river-bank, and soon lost sight of the last roof.

It was growing dark when I reached another village, perchel on the river-bank, like a flock of birds that had tired thoms lives with a long flight and paused there to rest.

I filt more restless than I had done since my journey began, and spike aloud, as if addressing some person:

"Am I to rest here?"

But the insure spirit which had guided me so far refused to answer. I went slowly on, trying to collect my thoughts and know where my journey was to end. I was completely worn cut, and it was with difficulty I could walk at all. My strength and it is have left me suddenly; it was the reaction of the it ver which hel consumed me for days.

I present the village; there was only a solitary dwelling have and there in sight. The wind grew more cold and piereing, and the snow began to full heavily. The blast was so powerful that it almost lifted me off my feet, and derived me of the little strength I had left.

I crizht a zhan ef a white house close at hand; the gate blew op n as I passed-I took it for a sign-walked the igh, and went up the winding path which led to the dwelling. As I neared the perch I could see the lights gleaming characters the closed shutters; but when I tried to me unit the steps, my strength failed, and I sunk heavily upon the icy stones.

I here a bell time amil the tumult in my brain-heard stris in the hall-the enter door was hastily opened, and a woman's voice reached my ear.

"It same like same person falling heavily. Do sec Will it wis. Margaret. God help any poor creature who is houseless this night?"

The hall-hamp sont its flickering rays out into the gloom, filling m and as I lay on the steps, my garments stiff and heavy with snow.

For an instant they did not discover me; some one stepped on the porch—there was an exclamation of horror—the same voice cried out:

"Sin's d. .1! () Margaret! Margaret!"

His limbs rais lun; they have through the hall into slight in mallil me on a s.fa. I was not insensible, has I could not frame a syllable, and lay passive while my clothing was removed, other garments put upon me, a warm drink held to my lips, which I was unable to swallow. After that I remember nothing, except that the same woman's voice called out:

"She is fainting! O my God, it is death!"

Then a great darkness gathered about me, faces and voices faded into the distance, and I drifted off through the thick gloom, trying in vain to stretch out my hands and beseech them to save me from the troubled waters down which I slowly floated to the deeper blackness beyond.

CHAPTER XXI.

NEW LIFE.

For weeks life was a blank. I remember nothing; the days came and went, but each successive one found me sense-less, helpless as before.

The first thing I recollect is opening my eyes in a large, pleasant chamber, carefully darkened to a twilight that suited my feeble vision. I was lying upon a bed, the curtains thrown back, so that I had a view of the room so far as the shadows would permit. I tried to think, to remember where I was; but there was a pressure on my head as if a cold hand had been laid there, and I knew nothing more.

It must have been another day when I again came to myself. I was too weak to move, but my head was free from pain. I saw a lady sitting by the bed; she was leaning over me with gentle solicitude, and when my eyes met hers in eager questioning, she smiled, and answered as if I had uttered the inquiries which struggled in my enfeebled brain.

"You are safe and in good hands. You have been sick, but you are better. Try to understand me and go to sleep."

She gave me something to drink, and I sunk into a quiet slumber.

That lady whom I had first seen was constantly with me, always kind and attentive; and there was something in the sound of her voice, the touch of her cool hand, which was inexpressibly grateful and soothing to me.

A fortnight after, I was able to sit up and converse a little. though I was still too weak to walk more than a few steps, and was carefally supported from my bed to the easy-chair in which it pleased me to recline.

One day, after having been assisted to rise, I lifted my hand to my hair had been cut quite short.

"It will grow again," my kind nurse said in answer to my I . h of wenter; "the dector ordered it to be done, much a minst my will. I assure you, for it was very beautiful.

"How came I here?" I asked, for the first time feeling able to think and ask questions.

"We found you lying on the porch," she replied. "Probably you had intended to come in, but your strength failed-"

"I remember," I interrupted; "I remember!"

Every thing came back to me then-my wanderings in the streets of the city-my flight-the long journey and the last territ le pang with which consciousness had gone from mo.

Where were you going?" she asked, gently.

"Ging?" I repeated; "going? Nowhere. I had nowhere to go."

"Were you in search of some friend ?"

"I have no friends," I answered; "no friends and no home."

"I saw the tears start to her eyes, but she repressed them, as if fearful of agitating me."

"Gd provides for the fatherless," she whispered; "trust yourself to Him, he will never fersake you."

I had not heard such language for a long, long time-not since Mr. Thornton died!

I whimered a request that she would read to me from the Bille, and she at once complied. I think I never heard a more pleasing reader. Her voice was exquisitely modulated, so soft and clear.

I listened in silence, only motioning her to proceed when she paused to see if I was tired, and drinking such strength and consolution from the blessed words she read as I had never before received.

At length she laid the book down and said:

"You must not listen any more to-day, my child; go to bed now and sleep awhile."

"Will you read to me to-morrow?" I asked.

" Yes, to-morrow. You will get strong now every day."

"I shall soon be well?" I sail, inquiringly.

"Very soon, I trust."

- "I am sorry; I thought God would have let me die."
- "We must be resigned to His will," she answered. "Remember the sweet promises I have just read to you, and be certain that 'He doeth all things well."

"I have waited so long," I said, rather to myself than her; is there never to be rest for me, never?"

"You will find it here," she said, and her voice soothed the trouble that had surged over my soul of the blackness of the past; "sleep, my child, be at peace."

I fell asleep with her hand clasped in mine—her dear voice murmuring a prayer that went with me into my slumber and blessed it.

So the days passed. She asked me no questions; I saw no one but her, an old servant, and the physician who visited me daily.

At last I was able to go down stairs with their assistance, and be taken into the pleasant parlor. It was a beautiful morning in early spring; the trees were putting out their leaves. A flock of robins were singing and calling from the mode branches in the yard, and the sunlight stole brightly in at the window, playing about me and warming my poor heart into new life. For the first time I asked how long I had been ill. The lady told me two months!

"And you have watched over me," I said—" you have cared for me as a mother would have done. I did not know that Heaven had left such an angel on the earth!"

"I have only done my duty," she replied. "I am repaid in seeing you well again." I leaned back in my chair with a gush of grateful tears. "Do not cry," she said; "see how bright the sun shines, how every thing speaks of peace."

"I want to cry," I answered; "it does me good."

She drew my head upon her shoulder, and, nestled against her heart, I wept myself into composure. "May I ask you a few questions?" she askel, when I was once more able to talk.

"Any thing you please," I said; "I have nothing to con-

Cial from Michael

"The grader postion of your history is known to me," shocoring it; "you revealed it in your delitium, living over the painful sames of your life, calling upon those who should have left a led year, so you can have very little to tell me."

"Did I mentica any names?" I asked.

"No one heard them but myself," she replied, "and all that I know will be shere lly kept. Your last name I never could catch-yer almost always called yourself 'poor Madge, poor little Madge.""

"Mynume is Malgo," I sail, "Malge Wylde-a strange name they used to say, but no stranger than my life has been."

"I. I it now begin anew," was her answer; "date another called a firm this sickness, and forget the old one."

"II w si. Il I sin?" I questioned, and the trouble came up a my - il agrica. "I do not know how or what to do-I was so sire and brave ence, but strength and courage have forsaken me."

"The will show you the way," she sail.

"I have "Y's. I will trust in him," I answered fervently. trusted in man too long."

" Yes are very young yet—there is a long life before you.

Let us he point your treather and over."

" (M. I can not bear any more," I exclaimed. "Gol will r indicate sul rany butter. This must be a new life that I take up now, or I had better have died with the fever."

"It will be a new one, my child, smetified by the memory cf. 11 tr .11 a by the courage with which you bore them-by the him, wemanly nature that aided you in the darkest 1 -- **

"I have no frient," I said; "no one to whom I can turn. When I have your re f I am all alone again in the cruel, pitiless world."

"I, will be your friend; and, trust me, I will never forsake

you.'

"You," I said. "You will add to the kindness you have shown me—you are not tired—you are willing to do more?"

"Your own mother could not feel more kindly toward you than I do, Madge. I have promised to be your friend, and during my whole life no one can say say that I have ever broken a pledge."

"How shall I repay you?" I sobbed. "Tell me how."

By doing your duty-striving to be happy, and making the best use of the means placed in your reach."

"I must have work to do," I said, eagerly. "I can not be idle; I shall soon be strong enough-let me go to work."

"You shall-you shall !"

"I can teach many things. I have had classes in drawing; I can write. I am willing to do any thing—any thing, only to be at work."

"You will find that close at hand," she said. "We have a large school in our village; they are now in want of a teacher. If you prove yourself capable I can procure a drawing-class there, and you will carn enough to make you independent and tranquil."

"And I can live in this quiet village-find rest and peace here!"

"I trust so—I am certain of it. But you must not think of work yet; you must keep yourself calm and get strong as fast as possible. That is all you have to do at present."

"God bless you!" I said, sobbing on her breast my gratitude and my tears. "But I must not stay here; I shall never be able to repay you for what you have already done."

She clasped me to her bosom and talked to me for a long, long time, and when our conversation ceased, we understood each other well.

"I have no daughter, Madge," she said; "live with me-be my child!"

I had no words to speak my feelings, but she comprehended my every thought. Mutely my arms encircled her waist, and her kiss upon my forehead sealed the bond.

"Now be at rest," she said, and I was so.

CHAPTER XXII.

AWAKENING POWERS.

Trum passed on and I grew stronger, happier, more content than I had been in all my life before.

Mrs. Chester appeared to me hardly human. I used to marvel Heaven had not claimed her long before.

Sing was still a very lovely woman, and almost youthful looking, the arh she had approached middle age. There was the soil of a great sorrow upon the pale, beautiful face, but its litterness had pass I, leaving a holy calm. There was a possible charm in her every movement—kindness, gentleness, all womanly cm tiens and sympathies in her look, and my per, traingled heart turned toward her with an outpouring of affection, such as I remembered to have felt for my mother years and years lab re. In a few weeks I was sufficiently recovered to walk in the open air, to sit dreamily in the warm sufficient, to read, and even employ my pencil.

The reward several lovely views from the house itself, which I skitched; and I made copies of pictures from namely, which Mrs. Chester showed to the principal of the self, and the several her influence, procured me the situation I desired, at a salary fur beyond what I had ventured to hope.

I put my past life resolutely aside, and when memories from its durkness would intrude, they had lost their power to

; lin.

The laye which I had felt for Easton Amory was gone whilly exter my soul. I had not even hatred or contempt in him—no recallection connected with that wild dream had I was to tradle me. I could only thank God for having preserved me in my hour of temptation and peril.

My sold it is eccupied me during several hours of each know that both employers and pupils were satisfied. I made friends. Life blossomed into beauty around me. All my life before I had been an outcast, an alien—here I was loved and respected.

My home was with Mrs. Chester—after that first conversation it never occurred to either that I could have another. Peace and rest came to my heart, and with their dawning the powers of my mind woke to a strength and vigor they had never before possessed.

I wrote a great deal; and after a time my productions gained that force which only practice can give. Mrs. Chester sent a number of articles, both prose and verse, to leading magazines, and before I could realize it. I was a constant contributor to their pages, rapidly gaining favor and emolument.

At last I began a novel. I did not even confide my secret to Mrs. Chester. I felt timid to approach the subject.

I recollect so well the day upon which it was commenced. The thought had been in my mind for weeks and weeks—the plot had worked itself out—the characters stool clearly before me. I stopped writing for some time—that pleasant dream was so palpable that I could put pen to nothing else.

I was sitting with Mrs. Chester in the library that day—she had been reading to me, but I had heard nothing except the melody of her voice, which blended itself pleasantly with my dream. At last the power upon me would no longer be controlled. I left the apartment without a word—I could not break the spell—went up to my chamber and begun to write.

I labored from midday until dusk, and then a tap at the door aroused me. I rose, laid down my pen and put away the seattered sheets, weary physically, but with an acuteness and an activity of mind I had never felt.

Mrs. Chester entered softly, and bent over me.

"You naughty Madge," she said; "come down immediately."

I obeyed her at once, but I felt as if dreaming still.

"You have had no dinner," she said, laughing; "did you know it? I saw you were inspired when you went out of the library. But what have you been doing? Really, you look quite dazed—what revelation have you had?"

"I will tell you in a fortnight," I replied; 'let me have my own way till then."

Mrs. Chester complied at once, and never, during the interval, dill she evines the slightest curiosity. I was left to myself, walking about, dreaming at will, and working with heart, and soul, and hand.

When the time hal expired, I went down to her one evening, with as much of the manuscript as I had been able to complete. I real it to her, made the story plain, and then asked her if it should be finished.

I remember so well the look she gave me, so full of love, but she only said:

"My chill, you have a great gift bestowed upon you; be sure that you employ it aright."

After that I read to her every evening what I had written; we discussed every separate chapter and scene, and from her ju llei us criticisms I received wonderfal benefits.

I write! faithfally, and with my whole soul in the task. There was a log vacation in the school, and the pleasant summer was a season of freedom.

Mrs. Chester to ik good care of me; she insisted upon my writing only a certain number of hours each day; she made har take I make and drives, and put every thing like work crear in madeflett asile when I left my desk.

I was well, hat her than I had ever been-happy in the consol isn's that my drams were no longer aimless—that I had make the may saljets instead of submitting to their tyranny.

At the plant all, there was a voil in my heart, an ci. i i... s-10 crasing for that poor love which had died outthat a part at my own blin has, and regret for much that I hal find he therip in the me.

I talled heavy with Mrs. Chaster; more and more I re-Cili. Welter Steart's go dress, his purity of character, and the later malle qualities I had once everlooked. I could see them all now, and contrast them quietly with the passion, impulsiveness, and reckless character which had left Easton Among the late of the second man, and represented myself for my own blindness and folly.

Mrs. Chester was a patient, attentive listener; and after one of those confidences I rose up calmed again by her sweet counsels and tender sympathy.

When October came, with its purple skies, its gorgeous woods, its soothing, holy influences, my book was finished. I laid down my pen for the last time with a sigh, and the sorrowful feeling with which one would part from a dear friend. I had lived so long among the creations of my own fancy that I could not lear to see them fade from me, and know that they would never be mine again.

I had bent my whole mind to my work; I had written and re-written, considered every incident and page. I had tried to make a good book—one from which those who read would rise up benefited and strengthened. I knew that the writing of it left me a better woman. I have it not on my soul that I wrote a line or a word, which, on my death-bed, could rise to haunt me with the wrong it had done.

Mrs. Chester took the manuscript from me, saying only that I had no further concern in the matter—it was her child now, and to be dealt with as she saw fit.

I asked no questions; I thought little about it after the first few days of missing its companionship; I was languid and indisposed to mental exertion, as continued labor is sure to leave one—I only wanted to be quiet.

Meantime, life passed pleasantly. My duties in the school commenced anew; I read, walked, sailed on the beautiful river, growing each day calmer and more at rest.

CHAPTER XXIII

HOPE AND FAME.

The autumn glided on toward winter, and there had been no talk of my novel between us. Mrs. Chester would not allow me to read either newspapers or magazines, but she managed so well that I really had no thought of her reason.

She never told me the book had been placed in the hands of a pullisher, and I had ceased almost to think about it-any writ r will understand that feeling.

At length, one day, I was in the library, lying on the sofa, and very improve in my illeness, when Mrs. Chester entered, laking this land excited, and happier than I had ever seen her.

papers and reviews in my hands, pointed out particular paragraphs, saying:

" Read those, Madge."

I did read them-read in a sort of dream notices of my

"It can int be," I sail; "I den't understand it at all."

Reader, I was famous!

But the selling arms were about my neck, that dear voice was in in iring paid in my car sweeter than any the world could give.

"I am sold in i," I sall; "I must be dreaming."

Note: all all the future of the shall make amends—it is true, it and clear before you—thank God and be satisfied.

After a time we were both calmer, and then I asked her to me, for it looked so mysterious and incomprehensible.

"And the it is published!-but we have never seen even the proof-sheets."

She took a volume from the table and handed it to me-it was my own novel.

"I read the proofs," she said, laughingly, "and consider myself a blue-stocking on the strength of it. I was determined to astonish you, and I flatter myself that I have succeeded."

"Indeed you have—but please explain the whole affair to me."

"This was the way of it, illustrious lady! I sent the manuscript to a publisher of great influence whom I had once known—he was acquainted with your name from your magazine articles. The book charmed him—he accepted it at once, and on the most liberal terms. It is creating the utmost interest, and is the great success of the season. I have kept every thing from you until now, but as your name is in everybody's else mouth, you ought to know your own worth."

She was radiant with happiness. Had I been her own child she could not have rejoiced more sincerely.

"You are making not only fame but money," she said, smiling; "the editions are selling like wildfire, and you will be an heiress after all."

So we fell to won lering and marveling that it should have so befillen—at least I did, but she said:

"You are only a child in spite of all you have suffered, my pretty Madge."

"I believe I always shall be," I replied.

"I hope so," she sail, earnestly; "yes, always a child, but a child-woman."

"If I were more like you!"

"Saffering affects us differently; it would never have made you like me. Madge, you have a great gift committed to your charge. I am only an humble servant of His will."

"You are my preserver, my guardian-angel! But for you, where should I be? Mrs. Amory was kind to me, my friend, but you have trught me to live for something beyond the hour—to make my life of use; after all, the book is more yours than mine."

"My dear," she said, playfally, "I claim only the glory of having corrected the proofs. I defy any body to point out an error."

" It was fortunate that my crabbed writing was not trusted wholly to the discretion of the printers. I certainly am much obliged to you."

" Phase to show it by putting on your bonnet and going with me to walk-you have been sitting in the house too long."

"I believe you consider fresh air a remedy for 'every ill that flesh is heir to."

"I certainly think it an excellent preventive. Look at vourself: Low much healthier you are in body and mind when you take regular daily exercise-cheerful, hopeful and haj yv."

"It is your presence, your care, that makes me so," I answered. "Oh, my dear friend, I am the work of your Lands You have taught me, lifted me up, brought out the I wers of my min !-made me all that I am or ever shall be."

"With G. I's h-lp," she whispered; "think what poor creatures we should be without that."

So we were grateful for the good that had come upon me, and received it prayerfully.

Already I could see that my past sufferings had all worked to my benefit; they had given me a knowledge of life; taught me deeper insight into the human heart, and helped to prepare me fir the princes in which I had taken upon myself-one that I reverence I and strove to honor always.

CHAPTER XXIV.

HAPPINESS AT LAST.

When winter appeared close at hand, it suddenly stayed its progress, and a troop of beautiful Indian-summer days descended upon our mountain home.

The skies were their most transcendent hues—the air was mild and calm—every thing spoke of peace; but there came upon me a sadness which a season like that will always bring, only it was deeper than it will ever be again.

I was bowed beneath a vague, unsettled sorrow which nothing could dispel, but no one chid me for it. I think it was neither weak nor wicked. As much as was possible, I restrained my feelings, but I could not always prevent the gust of emotion which would sweep over my soul. There was no bitterness in it—not much of vain regret; but a strange lenging, an unsatisfied yearning, a great aspiration which begged for comfort, and I had none to offer.

One day, Mrs. Chester had gone out upon some business, and I was alone for many hours. I felt very solitary, full of unrest. I sung low, mournful songs for a time, but grew weary of that, and, pushing away my guitar, as I had done books and papers before, allowed myself to fall into a long, dreary revery, such as I had come often to in lulge in of late.

The tears were still wet upon my checks, though I could not have told why I wept, and blaming my own folly, I broke from the crowd of sorrowful thoughts that Launted me like a host of repining spirits, making me a companion in their suffering.

A volume of engravings lay upon the table, and I took it up, turning to a face that always possessed a peculiar charm for me—it reminded me of Walter Stuart.

It seemed more like him then than ever before. There were the same truthful eyes—the same sunny wave to the brown hair; the mouth so firm yet sweet, wearing the look of a man who knew no deceit. It was a face that a stranger might have trusted; the wretched would have turned to it for consolation; a grieved child would have known instinctively that there he should find sympathy.

My thoughts went back to the childish days at Woodbrook -to our last terrible parting. I found his character always consistent-always upright and decided, yet gentle and tender as the nature of woman.

I remembered the peculiar sweetness my name always had when uttered by his lips, the misty softness of his eyes when he pronounced it, and it was with a heavy sigh that I laid the volume aside, confessing to myself that I was wiser now, and that, were the threads of my destiny again to be placed in my hands, I would fling them forth far differently from the course they had taken of old.

"Walter," I involuntarily said aloud, "Walter, I was blinded by a frenzy-could I see you now I might at least beg to be forgiven for my waywardness and cruelty."

"See how your wish is answered," said the sweet voice of my only friend, speaking suddenly.

At her words I looked up-she glided away like a spirit of light, and in her place was he for whom my soul had called-Walter Stuart was standing by my side.

A long hour after, the door opened softly, and Mrs. Chester stood there smiling down upon us. How that time had passed I can not tell. I know that to me it was as if heaven had suddenly opened and dazzled my eyes with its glory.

"My children," she said, moving toward us, "be content! The clouds have passed-lo, the new morning! Will you accept me as your mother, Madge?"

Walter Stuart drew me gently to her feet; we knelt there together, and she pressed her silent kiss upon the forehead of each. I was startled-I looked wonderingly from one to the other.

"I do not understand," I said; "what is this mystery?"

"One that is easily explained," she said. "When your delirium revealed to me who you were, I recognized the girl who had been Walter's hope and dream for years. The physician forbade my allowing you to know any fact that could agitate you, and I kept my secret a little longer than was necessary. Madge, I am Walter's mother—will it be a new bond between us?"

I know my arms were about her neck, my kisses on her cheek, but what I said can not be told.

She pushed me gently away.

"Walter looks jealous-go back to him."

I crept to the shelter of his arms again, feeling that henceforth there was a resting-place for my poor heart.

When we had all grown more composed, I learned every thing that had been unknown to me.

When Walter Stuart saved me from that bad man, he had been on the eve of starting South upon business which could not be deferred. He was forced, after a day's search, to leave me for a time, writing to his mother to come at once to New York and spare no efforts to find me.

Before she could comply with his letter, I had found my way to her house—the rest is simple enough. Business had detained Stuart; besides, his mother had written him that on all accounts it was better he should remain where he was for a season.

I made few acquaintances in the village. Mrs. Chester was a stranger there, Walter entirely unknown, and never having heard the name of her second husband, it was, of course, natural enough that no revelation of the tie between herself and Stuart should have reached me.

"Now you understand it all, Madge," Walter said, "when the story was concluded.

I looked into his face, pale with the emotions which rushed over me as I thought of the storms I had battled, the ship-wreck I had escaped. He read my thoughts as he had always done—drew me to his heart and said:

"It is over, Madge, forgotten; my own beautiful, gifted wife !"

"Come to me, my children," whispered our mother, and again we knelt at her feet, and when she pressed a parent's kiss upon each forehead, we heard the murmur of her voice in blessing, and felt the flow of her tears in holy thanksgiving.

A ROMANTIC LIFE.

BEADLE'S BIOGRAPHICAL LIBRARY NO. 3.

To Issue FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 22D,

KIT CARSON:

THE ROCKY MOUNTAIN GUIDE,

AND

SCOUT OF THE WESTERN PLAINS.

The life of this celebrated Explorer, Scout and Guide is one of the most singular and exciting character. From the day of his first appearance in the Expedition of Exploration under Col. Fremont, up to the present moment, his services and experiences have served to add to his reputation as one of the most brave and sagacious leaders and pioneers who ever trod the wilderness, or penetrated the fastnesses of the American Indians.

The life here offered has been especially prepared for this series by a very competent and distinguished writer. It will detail at length Carson's varied adventures and achievements, his miraculous escapes and incredible sufferings—his services as guide, pioneer, explorer &c., &c., altogether rendering it one of the most romantic biographies ever issued.

BE SURE TO PROCURE IT, OLD AND YOUNG!

BEADLE AND COMPANY, Publishers, 141 William Street, New York.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOKS,

FOR THE MILLION!

BEADLE'S DIME SCHOOL MELODIST, BEADLE'S DIME LETTER-WRITER, BEADLE'S DIME GOOK-BOOK, BEADLE'S DIME RECIPE-BOOK,
BEADLE'S DIME SPEAKER, Nos. 1 & 2.
BEADLE'S DIME DIALOGUES, Nos. 1 & 2.
BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF FUN, 1 & 2.
BEADLE'S DIME MILITARY SONG BOOK.

BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF ETIQUETTE, BEADLE'S DIME DRESS-MAKER, BEADLE'S DIME MELODIST, BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF DREAMS,
BEADLE'S DIME CHESS INSTRUCTOR,
BEADLE'S DIME BOOK OF GRICKET, BEADLE'S DIME BASE-BALL PLAYER,
BEADLE'S DIME BUIDE TO SWIMMING

Bendle's Dime Song Book No. 1, Bendle's Dime Song Book No. 2, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 3, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 4, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 5, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 6, Beadle's Dime Song Book No. 7.

BEADLE'S DIME NOVELS.

A DOLLAR BOOK FOR A DIME!

Each volume contains One Hundred and Twenty-Eight large 12mo. pages of letter-press, printed with clear and expressly-prepared type and book paper, and bound in heavy paper covers of bright salmon color—making a volume of much beauty, and delightful to read. The volumes will be issued semi-monthly, in regular succession.

Dime Novels Now Ready:

No. 1.—MALAESKA: THE INDIAN WIFE OF THE WHITE HUNTER.

No. 2.—THE PRIVATEER'S CRUISE, AND THE BRIDE OF POMFRET HALL.

No. 3.-MYRA: THE CHILD OF ADOPTION.

No. 4 -ALICE WILDE: THE RAFTSMAN'S DAUGHTER.

No. 5.-THE GOLDEN BELT; OR, THE CARIB'S PLEDGE.

No. 6.-CHIP: THE CAVE-CHILD.

No. 7.—THE REEFER OF '76; OR THE CRUISE OF THE FIRE-FLY.

NO. S.—SETH JONES OF NEW HAMPSHIRE; OR, THE CAPTIVES OF THE FRONTIER.

No. 9.—THE SLAVE SCULPTOR; OR, THE PROPHETESS OF THE SECRET

NO. 10.—THE BACKWOODS' BRIDE: A ROMANCE OF SQUATTER LIFE.
NO. 11.—THE PRISONER OF LA VINTRESSE; OR, THE FORTUNES OF A CUBAN HEIRESS.

No. 12 .- BILL BIDDON, TRAPPER; OR, LIFE IN THE NORTHWEST.

No. 13.—CEDAR SWAMP; OR. WILD NAT'S BRIGADE.

No. 14.—THE EMERALD NECKLACE; OR, MRS. BUTTERBY'S BOARDER.
No. 13.—THE FRONTIER ANGEL: A ROMANCE OF KENTUCKY RANGER'S LIFE
No. 16.—EZEKIEL PERSONS: AND HIS EXPLOITS ON TWO CONTINENTS.